While the great struggle in which nearly half a million men were involved, was progressing indecisively, Russia had high hopes that her favorite General would retrieve all the previous disasters by a signal victory. But hope turned to dismay when it became evident, on August 31st, that Gen. Kuroki was slowly turning the Russian left flank and seriously threatening the rear of the Czar's army. At this time the whole Russian army was practically on the firing line, and the terrible artillery duel was proceeding day and night. Many thousands had fallen on both sides, and the hospitals in Liao-Yang were filled, while the Japanese field hospitals were also crowded with the wounded and the dying. Missionaries and Red Cross workers were indefatigable on the battlefield, caring for the injured.

On Sept. 1, came the crisis of the battle. Kuroki's army crossed the Taitse River, and, turning the Russian left, drove their cavalry before him, attacking Kouropatkin's army in the rear. Simultaneously, the heights surrounding the city were captured by Generals Oku and Nodzu, after a fierce assault, and the Russian right and center driven in. Soon the were fortified. It was confidently believed by the Russians that the place could be held successfully and indefinitely against any force that might advance against it.

After the Russian retirement from Anping, Gen. Kouropatkin himself chose Liao-Yang as the base of future operations, and occupied it with his entire army, only a small force remaining at Moukden. When the three Japanese armies of Gens. Oku, Nodzu, and Kuroki, under Marshal Oyama's supreme command, began operations against it, it soon became apparent that the greatest battle of the war would be fought there, if the Russians made a stand. The combined Japanese forces aggregated 240,000 men, with 1,000 guns, many of large calibre; while Kouropatkin's army, though considerably less in point of numbers (210,000 with 700 guns), had the advantage of an entrenched position that was considered impregnable.

On August 26 the Japanese, having placed their heavy batteries, assumed the offensive, and from early dawn of that day until the evening of September 2, the region round about Liao-Yang was an inferno. Covering a semicircular line nearly fifteen miles in length, the Japanese forces kept up an incessant and deafening bombardment to which the Russian guns steadily replied. Repeated attacks by the Japanese on different positions were repulsed. Bayonet charges were of frequent occurrence. It was as though half a dozen battles were in progress simultaneously. Positions were lost and won and lost and retaken again. Thus, with varying fortunes and with frightful carnage, the great battle went on for days, Kouropatkin's troops stoutly defending every point assailed. It was astonishing to witness the spirit of the troops in the face of danger and almost certain death. Some of the Russian reg-

Russians began to evacuate Liao-Yang, first setting fire to it; and the burning town was occupied by a force of the enemy, while the main Japanese army pursued the retreating Russians. Gen. Kouropatkin, with his whole army, proceeded toward Tatzeh, where he took up a strong position on the right bank of the Taitse River. It is reported that Gen. Kuroki controls the Moukden road, so that the Russians are in great danger of being cut off in that direction. There are strong forts on the right bank of the river, which are controlled by the Russians, and if their retreat does not become a rout, it is probable that another severe battle will have to be fought before a definite result is reached.

In the nine days' fighting around Liao-Yang up to Sept. 1, the estimated losses are: Russians, 15,000 men, and a considerable number of guns; Japanese, 12,000 men. It is very likely that these figures will be greatly increased, when the results of the frightful carnage of Sept. 1 and 2 are fully ascertained.

CALLED HIGHER

Entered into rest on July 4, 1904, in Walla Walla County, Wash., E. M. Peck, at the age of eighty-six years, six months and five days. He fell asleep in Jesus after serving him faithfully since early youth. A true follower of Christ and faithful worker in his cause.

At Collinsville, in the quiet of the evening hour, on Sunday, April 24, Mr. Ezra Botsford passed to his eternal rest. Many of the early days of Mr. Botsford's life were passed amid the trials and deprivations incident to a pioneer life. He was a blacksmith by trade, and counted among his warmest friends Elihu Burritt, the "learned blacksmith," whom he entertained at his home many times. Mr. Botsford was a diligent worker in the Master's vineyard, and was possessed of an all-absorbing desire to save souls and bring them nearer to their heavenly Father. He died at the age of ninety-five, having lived a consistent, useful Christian life for over seventy-six years. Truly may it be said of him, "He walked with me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity."

THE EDITOR'S BRAIN

Did Not Work Well Under Coffee.

A brain worker's health is often injured by coffee, badly selected food and sedentary habits. The experience of the Managing Editor of one of the most prosperous newspapers in the Middle West, with Postum Food Coffee illustrates the necessity of proper feeding for the man who depends on his brain for a living.

"Up to three years ago," writes this gentleman, "I was a heavy coffee drinker. I knew it was injuring me. It directly affected my stomach and I was threatened with chronic dyspepsia. It was then that my wife persuaded me to try Postum Food Coffee. The good results were so marked that I cannot say too much for it. When first prepared I did not fancy it, but inquiry developed the fact that cook had not boiled it long enough, so next time I had it properly made and was charmed with it. Since that time coffee has had no place on my table save for guests. Both myself and wife are fond of this new cup which 'cheers but does not inebriate' in a much truer and fitter sense than coffee. My stomach has resumed its normal functions and I am now well and strong again mentally and physically.

"I am confident that coffee is a poison to many stomachs, and I have recommended Postum with great success to a number of friends who were suffering from the use of coffee." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

BUILDING FOOD

To Bring the Babies Around

When a little human machine (or a large one) goes wrong, nothing is so important as the selection of food which will always bring it around again.

"My little baby boy, fifteen months old, had pneumonia, then came brain fever, and no sooner had he got over these than he began to cut teeth and, being so weak, he was frequently thrown into convulsions," says a Colorado mother.

"I decided a change might help, so took him to Kansas City for a visit. When we got there he was so very weak, when he would cry he would sink away and seemed like he would die.

"When I reached my sister's home, she said immediately that we must feed him Grape-Nuts and, although I had never used the food, we got some and for a few days gave him just the juice of Grape-Nuts and milk. He got stronger so quickly we were soon feeding him the Grape-Nuts itself and in a wonderfully short time he fattened right up and became strong and well.

"That showed me something worth knowing and, when later on my girl came, I raised her on Grape-Nuts and she is a strong healthy baby and has been. You will see from the little photograph I send you what a strong, chubby youngster the boy is now, but he didn't look anything like that before we found this nourishing food. Grape-Nuts nourished him back to strength when he was so weak he couldn't keep any other food on his stomach." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

All children can be built to a more sturdy and healthy condition upon Grape-Nuts and cream. The food contains the elements nature demands, from which to make the soft gray filling in the nerve centres and brain. A well fed brain and strong, sturdy nerves absolutely insure a healthy body.

SIN IN HIGH PLACES

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

SIN is always terrible in itself, and in its consequences, but sin against abundant light, and sin in a place of unique power and privilege, must bring with it judgment in proportion to the offence. In judgment for the sin of Solomon, to whom God had appeared twice, in his linking himself with a heathen wife, in his disobedience of all the special rules which God had made for the kings which should reign over his land, and for his grievous fall into idolatry, God divided Israel. Israel had dishonored God, and had willingly fallen into the idolatry of the king and of his many wives, and now God would dishonor among the nations, by their strife and jealousy, the very people whom he had chosen to be a blessing to all peoples.

Jeroboam, who founded the first dynasty of Israel as separate from Judah, went into idolatry and set up golden calves on the two roads which crossed the northern and southern frontiers of his land, that none of his people might go up to Jerusalem to worship. It was only the exceptions, the Levites and the sons of Zadok, "which went not astray when Israel went astray," which dared to risk the wrath of the king by leaving their possessions and their friends, and passing over the border to reside in Judah, and still worship in the house of God in Jerusalem (comp. II. Chron. 11: 13-17; Ezek. 44: 15). These, it would seem, would have a special blessing when they shall attain that age of the Millennium of which our Lord speaks (Luke 20: 35, 36).

Jeroboam laid the foundations of his kingdom in departure from God, and earned the unenviable reputation which has clung to him for nearly three thousand years, "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." We have seen how God cut off his seed, and how dynasty after dynasty arose in Israel, all, without exception, following the sins of Jeroboam, until at last God removed Israel out of his sight, and caused Shalmaneser to carry them captive into Assyria. How inexpressibly awful is the consequence of one man's sin unrepented of and unfor-given. How many kings, princes, prophets, as well as people in general, may have had to curse the day when Jeroboam made the golden calves, which were an unspeakable offence and insult to the God of Israel. How many a father of a family, by his example of drunkenness, of untruth, of unfaithfulness in business, has caused sons and grandsons, neighbors and acquaintances to go astray. How many have been encouraged to be godless by one godless man who has been possessed of influence!

In Judah, although at first there was much mixture, the form of godliness existed in the time of Abijah, the son of Rehoboam, who had a certain amount of religion, but continued his father's sins, and "his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God as the heart of David, his father" (I. Kings 15: 2, 3). But Asa, his son, "did that which was right in the sight of the Lord." He was the first king since Solomon's time who attempted to attack idolatry; he took away the strange altars and the high places, and brake down the pillars, and hewed down the Asherim, and commanded Judah to seek the Lord, the God of their fathers, and to do the law and commandments. In his reign a testimony was borne for God, and the people as a whole went through an outward reformation. Outward fear of God then became as fashionable in Judah as idolatry was in Israel, while the readiness of the people to become idolatrous again, when Asa and his good son Jehoshaphat were removed, showed how it was always the exceptions and not the mass of the people whose hearts were really turned to God.

The reform which took place under Jehoshaphat went yet farther than that of Asa, for he brought back the knowledge of the Word of God, and instituted teaching priests, by whom doubtless many were led to serve God. Oh, how many there are who owe their conversion to a godly father, mother, teacher or friend! We none of us know the influence we are having, day by day, on others around us.

A Mission From Armenia

THE Armenian Archbishops of Armenia and Perso-India and Dr. Loris Melikow are at present in London, charged with a mission from the Catholicos of Etchmiadzin, the Supreme Patriarch of All Armenians, and were received recently at Lambeth Palace by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The two Archbishops are entrusted with a plea for help addressed to the Governments of Europe. They have already been to Paris, and have had interviews with President Loubet and M. Delcasse, who received them with the greatest sympathy, and listened to their account of the present condition and sufferings of the Armenian people. Upon leaving England they will proceed to Italy, Germany, and other European countries, to lay before their respective governments an appeal for vigorous and practical assistance.

A representative of the London Chronicle had an interview with Archbishop Joseph, of Armenia, and with Dr. Loris Melikow, who explained the situation in Armenia at the present time. The situation of the people, they declare, is unbearable and terrible. They are robbed, outraged, murdered, oppressed, continuously and unceasingly. In the country districts especially, violence and injustice to Armenians go on unpunished and unrebuked. At present famine is rife throughout the country, in consequence of the past massacres.

"Our people have no hope except in the action of European Powers," said the Archbishop. "If England and France, and Italy and Germany, do not combine to enforce the pledges already given, Armenian Christians will disappear from the face of the earth. The remedy of these things lies not with the Sultan, but with Europe. The Armenian Christians are as civilized as those of Europe. What is it they ask? Not the domination of Turks or Greeks. Not political power. But the right to live, to attain a certain measure of culture, to profit by the fruits of their own industry, to bring up their families in peace, to pray to the God of Christians without the terrors of persecution; in short, to have the liberty of civilized beings."

In the opinion of Archbishop Joseph, one very necessary reform required is an increase in the number of Consuls in Armenia. At present there are Consuls only in the chief cities, and they have no opportunity of getting accurate information about outrages in the surrounding districts.

A "London Christian" writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"A day or two ago, I read an account of the marriage of a French lady. Her former husband (who has departed this life) was French Consul in Armenia, and during the temporary absence of her husband this heroic lady, with a loaded revolver in her hand, defended 500 Armenians who had fled for refuge to the French Consulate from the Turks. For this noble deed the French Government made her a member of the Legion of Honor."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

H. O., Overton, Neb. "I know that God answers prayer, when he is asked in good faith in Jesus' name. He has answered many prayers for me."

North Texas girl: "The Lord has answered my prayers so many times, and has given me so many blessings, I esteem it a privilege to be able to tell of it."

Reader, Warsaw, Indiana. "To redeem a promise I made to the Lord, and to encourage some who may be in distress, I want to say that God very recently answered my prayers in the conversion of a dear one, and averting a calamity to our home."

Mrs. J. P., Alturas, Cal. "God surely answers prayers, for when in great trouble, when human help was of no avail, we prayed to him, and he answered by giving health to our little one, who was very sick. May we ever keep near him."

E. A. D. "I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayers for a dear friend in great affliction, I would acknowledge it to the world. I believe in answer to prayer, as he has removed the affliction."

Mrs. C. M. R., Oklahoma City, Okla. "Beyond the power of words to express what I have experienced of the love and mercy of my Heavenly Father, and of the efficacy of prayer through faith and trust in His Name."

J. B. F., Mobile, Ala. "I wish to add my testimony that God hears and answers prayers. Twice especially, when in great distress for loved ones, I besought him earnestly for relief, and in his loving kindness he heard and granted my petition."

WARD'S CATALOGUE is the POPULAR ONE everywhere, and is preferred by almost everybody to all others. We expect thousands of applications as soon as this announcement is read, so we urge you to get your application in early.

It's the Only Complete Catalogue Published

the only one that is absolutely up to date and complete in every detail, the only one that quotes nothing but perfectly dependable goods at prices the lowest obtainable anywhere. Catalogue No. 73 is all that a good catalogue should be. It represents the largest stock of goods in the world—11 different divisions, each a store in itself, 85 separate and distinct lines open for your examination. Practically everything we have to sell is included; no sending for special catalogues after you receive the big one. Everything in Catalogue No. 73 this year—an improvement we know will be hailed with delight by our thousands of friends and old customers.

Edition de Luxe

Nothing like it ever before attempted. Printed on heavy white book paper, making it strong and durable, rich in appearance, easy to read, and more desirable in every respect. The Edition de Luxe is a triumph in catalogue making. It contains over 30,000 illustrations, most of which are new and printed perfectly on the fine white paper used for the Edition de Luxe; 8,000 quotations of high-grade, absolutely honest merchandise, set in new type cast especially for this catalogue; 12 pages of carpets, rugs and portieres printed in actual colors, 2 pages of men's neckties in actual colors, about 200 pages of satin finished paper showing actual photographic reproductions of laces, embroideries, millinery, woman's fashions, furs, etc. This catalogue weighs over 6½ lbs. and is 3 inches thick. When we tell you that other catalogues don't weigh over 3 lbs. you will quickly see what an enormous book Catalogue No. 73 is. Experts pronounce it the finest specimen of a catalogue ever produced.

For the Men

The largest stock of hardware in the world is at your command, everything for your home, your barn, your farm, your ranch. No matter what your occupation is, we have what you need—your clothing, your shoes, farm implements, vehicles, harness, photo and electrical goods, books, watches, etc. Everything from windmills to fish hooks—all at prices so low that you can save anywhere from 15 to 50 per cent by trading with us.

For the Women

The very latest styles in women's wear, furniture, notions, groceries, glassware, toilet articles, stationery, sewing machines, books, jewelry, carpets, curtains, and 10,000 other good and necessary articles. Particular care has been given to our fashions in women's wearing apparel. Our buyers have picked up the best of everything shown in New York and other Eastern markets. Our styles are correct and the very latest—later than those shown in any other general catalogue. Don't buy from an old catalogue with last year's styles. Catalogues of other firms issued ahead of ours contain last year's fashions and are not trustworthy. We know this to be a fact, because this year's styles were not shown by the New York designers until August 1, and we have delayed the publication of Catalogue No. 73 until our buyers returned from New York with the new samples for next winter.

It is our policy to lead the procession, and you can positively rely upon our catalogue. Among other things of interest to women in Catalogue No. 73 is the largest retail stock of dry goods in the world. Choice silks, dainty linens, fashionable dress goods, sheeting, towelings, cotton goods, etc.; in fact everything a wide-awake dry-goods store should have—all of the best quality and very reasonable in price. With Catalogue No. 73 in your hands you can, at your leisure, select everything for your home, for yourself, for your family, without the trouble of a shopping trip, and with the absolute certainty that everything will be just a little bit better than you expect.

For Everybody

Catalogue No. 73 will be found a source of great convenience and economy. Regardless of your age, your occupation, or your wealth, it enables you to select exactly what you want without the annoyance of visiting a dozen stores and taking what they have to offer, whether it is just what you want or not.

We Do Not Sell Trash

Nothing but the best is good enough for our customers. Many firms are making a noise about their low prices; but don't be misled. A low price is no bargain unless you get quality. Anybody can sell worthless goods cheap.

THE MELODIES OF AUTUMN

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Should Sunday be a Day for Feasting or for Fasting? Is our present home observance of the Lord's Day, as it is found in the average church-going American family, what it should be? If not, how can it be made to conform more closely to the Christian idea?

Readers are invited to send in their replies to the foregoing questions, such replies to be brief, not exceeding 150 words. Address, SUNDAY QUESTION, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

L. B. H., Tacoma, Wash. I am the only one of my family who has become a Christian. How can I be happy in heaven, if I know that those I loved best on earth are lost?

You may be quite sure that every soul admitted to heaven will be happy there. The practical view of your apprehension is, that you pray and strive for the conversion of your unconverted relatives. Your efforts and prayers, and a godly, consistent life, may yet be blessed of God to their being drawn to Christ. Your duty is plain and is not affected by the doubt implied by your question. You may wisely leave all such matters in God's hands, taking care, however, that you neglect no opportunity of trying to win them for Christ.

Anxious Inquirer, Virginia. Do you think in the sight of God it is wrong to change one's name by law?

If it is to be changed for mere whim or to gratify vanity, then it is wrong; but it is frequently the case that there may be good reasons for changing. Some foreign names are very hard to pronounce, and, in this country, might seriously handicap their possessors, so they will be justified in securing a legal modification. This is frequently done.

M. F., Brooklyn, N.Y. Where can I find the song, beginning "Do they miss me at home, do they miss me?"

The song is published in sheet form by Ditson & Co., New York City.

Mrs. S. E. C., Bluff Springs, Ill. Will you tell me what is "a Sabbath Day's" journey and "a day's journey"?

A Sabbath Day's journey (see Ex. 16: 29), was 2,000 paces, or about six furlongs from the city wall. This would be about three-fourths of a mile. The length of a day's journey varies, according to Eastern writers, but it probably averaged from eighteen to twenty English miles.

As an offset to the "Potter Tavern," here is an interesting suggestion from a Washington correspondent (J. R. B.):

Let us open in country and city—everywhere—inns, which will be retreats for the poor men who, after a day of honest toil, may be able to pass the evening hours amid uplifting surroundings.

Of course, temperance etreats are meant. They would be a real boon in many communities.

Inquirer, Brooklyn, N. Y. In what sense are we to understand Paul's statement (Rom. 9: 3) of his desire to be accursed for the Jews' sake? How could his being accursed serve them?

It was simply an avowed signifying his intense love for his people, who hated him, and regarded him as having disgraced them by preaching Christ. He declared that he loved them so much that, if their salvation could be gained by his perishing, he would be ready to perish for their sake. He knew that they could not gain salvation in that way, but if they could have done so, he would have been willing to make the sacrifice.

W. T. Guthrie, Centre, Ia. 1. I heard a Sunday School superintendent say that missionaries who went out independent did more harm than good. Is that so? 2. What denomination is doing most for Christ's cause to-day? 3. Why do people say that Elisha and Elijah are the same person?

1. You must have misunderstood him. Many independent missionaries are doing excellent work. We could name a dozen who are noble workers. It is a great advantage, however, to have a regular connection with some established Board. 2. All are doing well and comparisons would be invidious. The greatest work is not always done by the largest denomination. God chooses his own way of producing results. 3. Those who do so do it in ignorance.

Wm. C. B., Tyrone, Pa. Can you tell me who wrote the hymn or song, beginning:

"Shall we meet beyond the river,
Where the surges cease to roll?"

The poem was written in the city of New York, in 1858, by H. L. Hastings, a well-known preacher and publisher of religious literature. A part of the poem was set to music, and it has been sung in every quarter of the globe. The original contained fourteen verses, only four of which were set to music.

S. M. S., Mansfield, O. Turkey's treatment of Macedonia and Russia's treatment of Finland are both proper subjects for the Peace Conference to consider. They are both subversive of human rights and liberties and should be condemned, of course.

D. M., Park River, N. Dakota. Was there a tribe of men in Palestine called "Ravens" in the time of Elijah? Is there any tribe by that name at the present time?

No. The miraculous feeding of Elijah at the brook Cherith has given rise to a great deal of purely fanciful speculation. An at-and Germany, St. Bernard dogs have been trained for field and hospital work, so that when a battle has been fought, they may be used in assisting the discovery of the wounded, especially at night.

C. B. Richmond, Ind. If you ask in Christ's name, believing, you will receive. God is ready to be gracious to all who come to him in simple faith, repenting of their sins and asking forgiveness. If your earthly father would forgive you for a fault when you ask him sincerely and express sorrow for the fault, how much more will your Heavenly Father forgive?

R. R., Detroit, Mich. Is it true that farming is slowly but surely declining, and, that in course of time, the American agriculturist will be one of the least important factors in our nation?

The statement is absurd on its face, and besides it is easily disproved. It is an illustration of the fact that figures may sometimes be made to tell something that is very wide of the truth. In 1880, agriculture represented 45.29 of the total of the five principal classes of occupation. In 1900, according to the last census, it represented only 35.79, an apparent loss; but in the same time, the number of persons actually engaged in farming in 1900, had increased from 7,714,000 to 10,382,000, and command that is to be observed. If the injunction were obeyed literally, it would probably involve the wearing of the hideous veils with which women in Oriental countries still cover their heads. The uncovering of the head in our land and time has no such meaning as it had in Corinth in that day, and we believe it to be quite justifiable.

L. M. D., Dayton, O. What is "The Washer woman's Song," and who wrote it?

The "Washerwoman's Song" is a poem written by Eugene F. Ware. It is said that the author was appointed Pension Commissioner, because the President was such an admirer of Mr. Ware's poetry. Here are the verses:

In a very humble cot,
In a rather quiet spot,
In the suds and in the soap,
Worked a woman full of hope;
Working, singing, all alone,
In a sort of undertone:
"With the Saviour for a friend,
He will keep me to the end."

Not in sorrow nor in glee,
Working all day long was she,
As her children, three or four,
Played around her on the floor;
But in monotone the song
She was humming all day long:
"With the Saviour for a friend,
He will keep me to the end."

I have seen her rub and scrub,
On the washboard in the tub,
While the baby sopped in suds,
Rolled and tumbled in the duds,
Or was paddling in the pools,
With old scissors stuck in spoons,
She still humming of her friend,
Who would keep her to the end.

Human hopes and human creeds
Have their wot in human needs;
And I do not wish to strip
From that washerwoman's lips
Any song that she can sing,
Any hope that song can bring;
For the woman has a friend,
Who will keep her to the end.

He died in 1816. He wrote some fine poems, but the best of all was his "Ode to God," which is the one referred to.

F. H., Reading, Mich. A great deal is being said about Bishop Potter's saloon, and he is criticized by Church, pastor and layman; but why criticize Bishop Potter for trying to make respectable what our government sanctions and legalizes? If God's professed people vote to license this hellish traffic, which we all know ruins men, soul and body, are they not as guilty as he, or as the one who deals it out?

The Negro Boy and the Bible

Walter Foster, a negro six years old, was a witness in a case in the Second Criminal Court, Jersey City, recently. Justice Manning hesitated to administer the oath. "Do you know what this is?" asked the Court, holding up the Bible. "It is the Bible," answered the boy, "the sacred Book of God. It contains his Word, which is the moral law. When we swear on it we admit his power to punish us for telling an untruth."

Justice Manning looked at the boy in surprise. "It is the best definition I have ever heard from child or man," he said, and the boy was allowed to tell his story under oath.

THE CREAM OF Dr. Talmage's Sermons

ABOUT two years before his death, Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage completed the work of revising the best sermons of his life, and these are now published in Twenty Generous Volumes, each volume indexed and cross-indexed separately, and then the whole set indexed in its entirety. The price has always been Twenty Dollars for the set, and the demand has been very large. A few months ago we advertised a number of slightly damaged sets at half price, namely, Ten Dollars, and the response was so prompt that we are glad to be able to repeat the offer, feeling sure that it will be good news to our readers. We desire to close them out promptly, in order to make room for new premium books. Every volume is absolutely perfect as far as contents are concerned.

At Only Half the Regular Price

Eight thousand pages of Dr. Talmage's best sermons, all thoroughly indexed, with a wealth of anecdote unequalled by the sermons of any other pulpit orator since the earthly ministry of the Great Preacher Himself, offer an exceptional opportunity which no Minister, Sunday School Teacher or Bible Student should fail to embrace.

tempt has been made to show that the people of Orbo, a small town near the brook (and who were called "Orebim" or "ravens"), were his successors. Others have asserted that the ravens were simply traveling merchants, and still others that they were Arabs or Bedawin—the ravens of the desert. All of these theories, however, are rejected by the ablest Biblical scholars.

Andrew C. P., Easton, Mass. Who wrote the prayer, beginning "Now I lay me down to sleep"?

The verse first appeared in the New England Primer as early as 1777. The author is unknown.

Rev. S. E. White, Round Mountain, Ala., writes:

If some of your readers would send us some Christian literature, we could make good use of it here. We are located on Lookout Mountain . . . have been teaching the children in these mountain districts for several years.

Mrs. T. A. C., Springfield, Mass. What is meant by the "dogs of war"?

When Antony exclaimed, "Let slip the dogs of war," Shakespeare was probably thinking of the dogs which both Romans and Greeks employed in battle. For years past, in Italy will keep on steadily increasing for many years to come. In these twenty years, the ratio of professional trade and transportation and manufacturing pursuits had very greatly increased, which accounts for the apparent discrepancy.

E. B. Washburn, Ill. Can you prove by the Bible that ladies are allowed to remove their hats during church service?

There are many things permissible which do not have to be proved by the Bible. You could not prove by the Bible that ladies are allowed to wear hats or gloves or shoes. You doubtless have in mind Paul's injunction (1. Cor. 11: 5-10), to the women of the Corinthian church to have their heads covered in church. But the reason he gives, by his reference to "the angels," and to woman's inferiority and subjection to man, shows that he was dealing with a local prejudice and a fashion of the time and place. A woman appearing with uncovered head at that time in Corinth was regarded as doing a shameful thing. It was liable to create a prejudice against Christianity, by making it appear that Christian women were immodest. It was not a question of morality but of shocking public opinion. As with the custom of foot-washing as a religious observance, it is the spirit of the

THE coming Peace Congress in Boston in October, will bring to our shores a very distinguished company of men and women, who will come as delegates to the Congress from all parts of Europe. As a noted peace advocate says, "The steady and sure progress of the world is toward the supplanting of the ways of greed and violence among nations, by the methods of reason, legality, and mutual regard."

The Christian religion is doing much toward creating a world-wide sentiment in favor of universal peace.

One of the best known of the delegates from abroad will be Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, who comes from Paris. He is a member of the French Chamber of Deputies, and one of the cleverest diplomats in France. He instituted the Arbitration Group in the French Parliament, and last year he addressed the British House of Commons on the subject of universal peace. Americans will also be glad to welcome Mr. John Lund, of Bergen, Norway, who is again to visit this country, coming especially to attend the Peace Congress. He was for fifteen years a member of the Norwegian Parliament, and for seven years a member of the Senate. Herr Lund was the host of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, when that body met in Christiania in 1899. He is vice-president of the Norwegian Nobel Committee, and is one of the foremost men in Norway. There will be other delegates from Norway, and from Sweden will come three delegates, whose entire expenses will be paid by a large-hearted and wealthy Swedish woman, who is interested in the Peace movement.

From Germany will come Dr. Adolf Richter, president of the German Peace Society and a member of the City Council of Pforzheim. He is one of Germany's strongest peace advocates. A scholar and clear thinker, as well as an excellent speaker, he is one of the foremost men of the movement.

From Belgium will come Senator La Fontaine, one of the ablest public men in that country and the author of a history of the arbitrations of the past century. He has not failed to attend a single Peace Congress in the past fifteen years. This will be his first visit to America.

Among the delegates from France are MM. T. F. Prudhommeaux and Jules Rais. M. Prudhommeaux is from Guise, and is editor of the peace journal, La Paix par Le Droit. He is very much interested in the famous Familistere, established by the late Jean Baptiste Andre Godin, at Guise. He will spend several months in America making a study of our community life. Jules Rais is secretary of the Arbitration Group in the French Chamber of Deputies, organized by Baron d'Estournelles.

From London will come quite a delegation of peace workers, and among them will be Dr. W. Evans Darby, and also Mr. G. H. Perris, secretary of the Cobden Club. Dr. Darby is secretary of the English Peace Society, and a noted Congregationalist minister. During his stay in America, Dr. Darby will probably address a number of colleges on "The True Peace Teaching of the Bible," and will speak before a numame Selenka. Baroness von Suttner is the founder of the Austrian Peace Society and author of the book, Lay Down Your Arms, which has been called the Uncle Tom's Cabin of the peace movement, and has been translated into all the languages of western Europe. Baroness von Suttner is a member of the Austrian nobility.

Miss Margaret Noble comes to Boston from India, where she has for years been a worker for the betterment of the condition of women in India. Her book, lately published under the title of The Web of Indian Life, reveals an intimate knowledge, which is the result of years of experience there. She has lived in the very centre of the Hindu quarter of Calcutta instead of in the European quarter of the city, and her position as a member of the "Order of Ramakrishna" has given her the free entree of the homes of the Bengali.

Madame Selenka is the wife of Prof. Selenka, of the University of Munich. She was a very prominent and influential figure at the Hague Conference, and presented to the President of the Conference an album containing the signatures of thousands of women belonging to prominent women's organizations favoring universal peace. She will come to Boston as a delegate of the German Peace Society. J. L. HARBOUR.

The Peace Congress opens in Boston on October 3. Sunday, the previous day, will be a special religious day. At the meetings on that day, the European preachers who come to the Congress will chiefly be heard. Pastor Charles Wagner, of Paris, author of The Simple Life, is coming; and some strong representatives of the German pulpit are hoped for. There is no more influential worker for the peace cause in all Germany than Pastor Umfrid, of Stuttgart. Effort is being made to secure the presence of some of the zealous clergy of Chile and Argentina, whose preaching has had so much to do with the recent disarmament of those South American republics, and to whose influence is due the erection of the great statue of Jesus Christ in the Andes, to guard the frontier, instead of the line of fortresses that had been planned.

The Peace Congress has met but once before in America—in Chicago, in 1893. The years since 1893 have witnessed the establishment of the Hague Tribunal and other noteworthy advances in the cause of arbitration. They have also witnessed surprising and terrible wars, which have emphasized the necessity of the devotion of civilized peoples to the duty of more efficient and adequate international organization. The coming of over seventy foreign delegates is expected, and the presence of double that number is probable.

On Sunday, October 2, the services in the leading

From Switzerland, come Dr. Feldhaus and his wife, to visit America for the first time and to make a study of the peace movement here. Dr. Feldhaus will address the Congress in Boston.

Among the women delegates from abroad will be Baroness von Suttner, Miss Margaret Noble, and Mad-

The Coming Awakening

TEXT—Isaiah 60:8.
"Who are these that fly as a cloud, and as the doves to their windows?"

AN axiom is a self-evident fact. "It is," the lexicographers say, "a proposition whose truth is so obvious at first sight that no process of reasoning or demonstration can make it plainer." It is a golden truism coined in the "Mint-House of Maxims," with the raised features of the Goddess of Truth stamped upon its side, even as the English shilling bears the profile of King Edward, an American silver dollar the outstretched wings of an eagle, as the Roman penny once bore the superscription and image of Cæsar, and a Grecian coin the features of Alexander the Great. It is an aphorism, an apothegm. It is as Hippocrates once said, "A succinct saying comprehending a complete statement." It is one of the many terse sentences of Benjamin Franklin which are found in Poor Richard's Almanac. No sooner do we read it than we say: "That is true." From the moment of reading no amount of illustration or argument can change us from our original conclusion. It is a strong armed charioteer, swiftly guiding before our eyes the "Chariot of Conviction." It is truth in a nutshell. It is a universe of analyses condensed in an epigram. It is, as the New England farmer might say, "a hog-tight fence," through which no monster of swinish error can thrust his bloated sides, and yet a fence so opened that the passer-by can look through the nailed up bars into the field of knowledge.

The truth of an axiom can be put to a practical test. Sometimes, however, men do not take the trouble to test it, but give credence to statements apparently contradicting it, instead of applying the test of experience. Some years ago, the French savants were asked to explain how it was that a pail of water containing a dead fish, weighed more than one of the same size containing a live fish. Dissertation after dissertation was written upon the subject. At last one common-sensed scientist whose brain had not been educated to the verge of imbecility, saw that the question was a misleading one. "A dead fish and a living fish ought to weigh the same," said he. "This truth is axiomatic." He put a live fish into a pail of water and weighed it. He killed the fish and put the dead body back into the same water, and weighed it again. The water containing the dead fish and that containing the live fish of course weighed the same. All the ingenuity expended in writing the dissertations had been wasted. The writers had been trying to find reasons for a phenomenon that did not exist.

A Mighty Power

Hundreds of men are simply doing the same thing in trying to find the reasons for the phenomenon stated by shallow observers, that the Church of Jesus Christ is losing its power over men. Long lists of reasons for this waning influence are cited, whereas the writers have only to open their eyes to discover that the Church of Jesus Christ is not losing its power over men. The Church of God was never so powerful as it is to-day. More strong men and strong women are bowing before its altars than ever before. More are the Church's teachings respected by statesmen, and in the homes and daily lives of our citizens, than ever before. I have not time to go into argument to prove this assertion. I would not to-day do so, if I had the time. Why? Because it is a self-evident fact that the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ is the most vital and essential influence in the world to-day. It is a self-evident statement. All intelligent people who have looked boldly and impartially at the facts, are ready to concede that the assertion is true.

But though the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ is growing more and more powerful day by day, yet we believe that still greater triumphs are before it in the future. The victories already won are small compared with those which are yet to be won, when nations shall be born in a day. Josiah Strong recently wrote a book entitled, The Next Great Awakening. I am not going to find my theme in the latest book of the famous author of Our Country. I am going to look through the inspired spectacles of a prophet who lived nearly three thousand years ago. Isaiah took the picture of the doves flying to their home-cotes in great clouds, as the symbol of the Church of the future, gathering in its members. So I shall try to show that the "coming awakening of the Church" is not only going to be a world-wide evangelistic movement, but also that the conquest of the world for Christ may be near, yes, very near at hand.

In the first place, let me say that such a movement as this, foreseen by the prophet and prefigured under the symbol of a flight of doves, is in accord with the record of history. Again and again there have been revivals which have brought into the Church vast numbers at one time. Since the day of Pentecost, when five thousand were converted under the preaching of the apostle Peter, there have been such great movements. How many were won to the truth by the teaching of Luther! What vast multitudes were gathered under the preaching of a Wesley, a Whitefield, a Finney, and a Moody, and of a Torrey and a Chapman, a Munhall and a Harrison of the present day. We know that Peter the Hermit, clad like John the Baptist, in untanned skins, walked through Europe lifting high in his hands the crucifix, until thousands and tens of thousands of devotees were ready, in 1096, to follow this enthusiastic ascetic to Palestine as the advance guard of the crusaders.

Glorious Precedents

We know that thousands upon thousands of Cromarty miners used to hang upon the thrilling words of John Wesley in the early mornings at five o'clock, before their day's work began. We know that no building was large enough to hold the crowds who wanted to hear Moody. Great halls had to be erected in Boston and New York and Chicago to hold the huge audiences. The Philadelphia depot, on account of its great size, had to be used in place of a church. Thousands upon thousands found Christ in the revivals of the seventeenth century under the preaching of the Puritans. Thousands upon thousands found Christ in the Methodist revivals of the eighteenth century. Thousands upon thousands found Christ in the first part of the nineteenth century, when Charles G. Finney had such power over sinners that a dying blasphemer said, "Don't let Charles G. Finney preach my funeral sermon, or he will preach my soul into heaven in spite of my own desires." But all these Gospel triumphs of the past centuries, are as nothing in numbers to the multitudes Isaiah saw crowding into the kingdom of Christ. Isaiah saw them coming, not by the hundreds or the thousands but by the millions. "Who are these," cried he, "that fly as a cloud and as the doves to their windows?"

The selection of the figure of a flight of doves is significant. It is, above other things, a suggestion of immense multitude. But few people realize the marvelous numbers and propagating powers of the doves of olden times. Biberg, the ornithologist, estimated that if a common pair of domesticated pigeons hatched nine times a year—which number of hatchings is not extraordinary for an average pair of these birds—and if these pigeons laid two eggs at one time, and all the fledglings which were hatched should live and hatch in turn, that single pair of pigeons would produce in four years nearly fifteen thousand descendants. The fecundity of the dove is about as great as the reproductive powers of the English sparrow or the Australian rabbit. The most graphic description ever written of the innumerable multitudes of the doves was penned by Alexander Wilson, the naturalist. Statements made by this Scottish-American traveler were endorsed by John Audubon. Among the ornithological authorities there can be no better endorsement than this: "Mr. Wilson wrote that down in Kentucky, in a place which migrating doves used to visit annually, their multitudes were so great that they literally destroyed whole forest regions. In this tract about which he wrote, the branches of every tree were filled with dove nests wherever a nest could be built. In many trees over one hundred nests had been constructed. Above the trees the multitudes of the pigeons' wings were so great that their flapping wings sounded like the boomings of a tornado. So great was the noise of their flapping wings that the horses of the farmers in that region often became unmanageable and could not be driven. Near Frankfort, Ky., Alexander Wilson saw a flock of migrating doves. The naturalist estimated that this single flock was two hundred and forty miles long and had an enrolment of at least two billion two hundred and thirty million two hundred and seventy-two birds." Isaiah describing the flocking to the church could not have chosen a more expressive figure. "These that fly as a cloud and as doves to their windows." The readers of his time would realize by it what countless throngs of men he saw in prophetic vision, hastening into the kingdom of God. Migrating doves of old were so many in numbers that Alexander Wilson said their moving wings often formed a curtain able to shut out the light of the sun and changed midnoon into the twilight of evening. The Church of God is now great in membership. But, church members, do you not look forward in holy ecstasy to the time when the thousands who are worshipping Christ now shall be changed into the millions? Do you not long for the millennial day when Christ's disciples shall flock through the church's doors in innumerable multitudes "as the doves fly to their windows?"

The figure is expressive not only of numbers but of spiritual qualities. The Church of the future is not to have a padded roll. It is not to be composed of a lot of members, who, as the five foolish virgins of Christ's parable, lounged around and slept, and had no oil for their spiritual lamps. It is not to be composed of men and women who occupy their church pews only on Sunday, and then when the benediction of the sermon is given, turn and shut their pew doors, and say "Good-by religion. I must go home now. You just stay here for a week, and next Sunday morning I will come back and see you and pat you on the back for an hour again, while the choir sings and the pastor prays." But in that church which Isaiah saw in prophecy, not only shall there be multitudes of worshipers, but all these multitudes shall be consecrated worshipers. These many worshipers shall be men of living faith, to whom the presence of God is an abiding reality, influencing them wherever they go, and in every moment of their lives. As Dr. Josiah Strong wrote in his opening chapter: "The supreme need of the world is a real God; not a Great Perhaps, but the great I Am; not a God of yesterday or to-morrow; but of to-day; not an absentee God, but one who is precisely here; not a Sunday God, but an every-day God." Such shall be the spiritual quality of the multitudes of worshipers seen by Isaiah in the symbol of the flying doves.

A Symbol of Purity

The symbol of the dove is also significant on account of the habits and disposition of the bird. It is used as a simile for gentleness and affection. The dove always will be recognized from among all feathered tribes as the most exceptional of birds. Alfred Tennyson, poet laureate of England, in a beautiful rhythmic masterpiece, once enunciated the doctrine that multitudes can make an object despised when it should be admired. Said he:

Once in a golden hour I cast to earth a seed.
Up there came a flower, the people said, a weed.
To and fro they went thro' my garden-bower,
And muttering discontent cursed me and my flower.

Then it grew so tall it wore a crown of light,
But thieves from o'er the wall stole the seed by night
Sow'd it far and wide by every town and tower,
Till all the people cried, "Splendid is the flower."

Read my little fable: he that runs may read.
Most can raise the flowers now, for all have got the seed.
And some are pretty enough, and some are poor indeed;
And now again the people call it but a weed.

But though "black-eyed Susans" or the "golden spore" or the "blue-eyed violets," on account of their great multitudes may be called a common flower—a weed; the dove, in spite of her multitudes, has never been called a common bird. The dove always has been and always will be the symbol of purity, gentleness and love. This symbol was recognized in heathen times. Because the dove signified purity, Venus had this bird as her emblem. Dean Stanley, in relating his Oriental travels, writes thus about the ruins of Ascalon: "The temple erected to the Syrian Venus is destroyed, but the sacred doves—sacred by innumerable legends of the spot and celebrated there even as late as Eusebius—still fill with their cooings the luxuriant gardens which grow in the sandy hollows within the ruined walls."

Biblical Associations

In the beautiful mythological legend Semiramis, the queen, was said in her youth to have been nurtured by a dove, and at death to have been changed into a dove. We find, however, in Christian nomenclature, the dove is also the symbol of purity and gentleness and divine love. In the Bible the dove has the most hallowed of associations. It was as a dove that the Holy Spirit appeared at the baptism of Jesus. It was two doves that the Blessed Virgin presented at the temple as an oblation for her purification after the divine birth. What says the Psalmist in reference to the man's redemption from sin and his cleansing through the blood of Jesus Christ? "Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver and the feathers with yellow gold." Oh my friends, in the beautiful vision of the doves, the poor, the gentle, the loving, the innocent doves, fluttering to their windows, cannot you see the symbol of a future glorified and consecrated assemblage crowding about the sacred altars of Jesus Christ?

This migration of the redeemed and spotless multi-les of human beings to Christ's churches shall not come with the purity of the dove, but also with the swift velocity of the dove. It will not come with the leadened feet of a man who, having been born in a Christian home, takes ten, fifteen, twenty, perhaps forty years, to make up his mind to be a Christian. It will not come with the slow processes some churches have, whereby their sessions or vestries or boards of missions place the applicant for church membership on probation. But these new accessions to the churches of Jesus Christ will come to the front rank of Christian service and worship as quickly as the name of a Saul is changed into a Paul. The new members whom Isaiah saw in vision fled to Christ's altar as quickly as the doves fly to their windows.

Not only is the dove's wing powerfully hurtled for quick flight, but that flight can be kept up for almost incredible distances. We find these wonderful flights recorded by the different columbine societies in different parts of the world. In 1865, thirty pigeons, which are only the domesticated names of the wild doves, were thrown into the air at Liverpool and started for Kent. The distance between these two places on a straight line is over 300 miles. The first bird which arrived home made that distance in twelve hours and forty minutes. If this homing pigeon flew in a direct line he traveled at an average speed of twenty-five miles per hour, for twelve long hours. Once a pigeon is let loose in London and traveled to Antwerp, 180 miles distant, in five hours. He made an average of about thirty-six miles per hour. In 1844 the dove's speed was tested, when seventy birds flew from St. Sebastian, Spain, to Venice. On a straight line they traveled a distance of over 600 miles. Homing pigeons have flown from Arizona to New York. The amazing swiftness of the dove is such that it can overfly mountains and even defy seas.

The swiftness of the dove's flight is one of the great inspirations to me of all of Isaiah's vision. Why the swiftness? Because I know that we can come to Christ now. Oh, my brother, it takes a swift wing for you in an instant of time to cross over all that far country of sin which separates you from God's dove-cote. The distances from Arizona to New York, or from St. Sebastian, Spain, to Venice, where doves have flown, are not as far. Tell me, oh man, did you not start forth on your journey of sin, ten, twenty, forty years ago? Why let me recount the years. You have not eaten a communion table since your mother died. You have not made one earnest prayer for ten years. If I as to-day to count over the list of your intimate friends, I would find them without exception to be men and women who have not been in the past, and are not now living Christian lives. Oh, my brother, my poor sin-sick brother, you have a long distance to come back to God. But you can come by divine grace. You can come now. You can come as quickly as the new converts of the Church which Isaiah saw in vision come to the mercy seat. You can come with a superlative swiftness. You can come with the lightning velocity of a flying dove.

But why talk about Isaiah's church of the future? Why caption this sermon with the title, "The Coming Awakening?" When Isaiah saw this migrating dove and used it as an emblem, was he alluding only to a future church? I think not. I think as the Hebrew prophet was standing there on the mountain of Inspiration, looking off on what was to come, he kept saying to himself, "Why is it not possible for this vision of God's church to be materialized now? Is not God willing to bring this beatific condition to present man if the members of the children of God will to-day co-operate with the Holy Spirit. Yes, he can. He will, was the prophet's thought. I know this is the thought to-day running through many a Christian's mind. God can and God will make the prophetic vision of Isaiah come true now, if we, the church members will only truly yield ourselves and consecrate our minds and hearts to Christ's will. Oh, man! Oh, woman! The greatest enemy of Jesus Christ to-day is not the infidel and scoffer outside of the Church. It is the man and the woman inside the Church who does not co-operate with Jesus in his purpose to save the world for Christ through the agency of his Church. If we yield ourselves to his will, even the smallest and the most insignificant can become mighty for God. For as Joshua hath said: "One man of you shall chase a thousand; for the Lord your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you. Take good heed therefore unto yourselves that ye love the Lord your God."

The symbol of the dove which Isaiah uses to describe the Church, could not be better illustrated than by the spectacle in the great square of Venice, which is flanked on the one side by the famous cathedral of St. Mark. With but few exceptions I have seen all the great cathedrals of the world. I have seen some as white as that of St. Peter's, whose walls, even though they may be hundreds of years old, seem to be as white as the whitest of alabaster. I have seen some dark as an African's skin, others red as an Indian's. I have seen some cathedrals which impressed me by their gigantic size. The higher I climbed on the roof of Milan's greatest structure, the more my awe and bewilderment. I have seen some that were perfect poems in stone. But, take it all in all, though it cost not nearly as much as some others, the most impressive cathedral I ever saw was that of St. Mark's of Venice.

Like unto natural scenery, St. Mark's is the Yellowstone Park, not the Yosemite or the Gothard Pass among the cathedrals. It impressed me not with its size, so much as its exquisite colorings. Its roof, its walls, its arcades all blended as the colors of a rainbow frozen in stone. The tops of its lofty columns were not hideous with grimy gargoyles. They were chiseled into flower gardens, which grew at your feet, or with their leaves hung down from above. These different flower gardens were so perfectly chiseled that it seemed as if the winds, sweeping up from the Venetian canals, were gently swaying them.

Over the front doorway were the four massive bronze horses which Napoleon carried away to Paris after his conquest in Italy, but which the overthrow of the Bonaparte dynasty restored. There, within those walls, the chancel and auditorium blend in such perfect harmony, that when I stood before the altar's picture of the dying Christ, I felt for the first time in a European cathedral, that I was in the presence of God, and in the place of prayer.

But though I saw many places in the Venice cathedral that entranced me, after all, my greatest lesson learned there, was outside the cathedral walls, and not within. I learned that lesson there, not from the cold stones of a building, but from the warm hearts of living doves. There, from behind the towers, and from within the recesses down from the roof and the four great bronze horses, from pillars and vestibules, the doves gather around you by the hundreds. They came as fearlessly to my side as my little children might come. They perched on my shoulder, on my hat. They fluttered over my head. They crowded by the hundreds at my feet to eat of the food I had ready for them. As they fluttered about me, I said to myself, "Would that God's sinful children might here gather about these church doors, as I see my God's little feathered loved ones." When I spoke these words, involuntarily I started. I said to myself, "Why will not God's sinful children thus come to God's sanctuaries?" Did not Isaiah in vision see them coming? Shall they not come? Will they not come now if the Christian church members feed them with the "Bread of Life," as I am feeding these birds with little crumbs? Yes, they will. They will, if we Christian church members only live right, and offer to the outside suffering world the right kind of divine sustenance. Will not you and I, oh church members, by our examples and welcome and Gospel food, make Isaiah's vision a possibility now? Will not you and I, as followers of Christ, beckon the sinners to Him, and they will come as doves come to their windows?

A REAL HOME FOR WORKING GIRLS

Where those Earning Small Wages Find Safety and Comfort in the Great City

YES," said the sweet-faced matron, as she showed with pride the comfortable quarters for working-girls with small comes; "we have a very pleasant home here, the girls all feel at home, and are very willing to conform to the necessary rules and regulations. We do not have any." "Many girls?" was asked. No," she laughingly responded, many rules. We have forty girls - all we can accommodate. I turned away seven to-day because we had no room for them. We hope to have a larger house some day - one built for the purpose, and even then how few will be able to take advantage of the Home, in comparison to the numbers who will still be struggling along on starvation wages. We have girls here who earn but three and four dollars per week. They pay us one-half of their wages. When they are earning more than seven dollars per week, then we do not keep them longer; they must go and make room for poorer sisters. We have a very nice class of girls; many of them work in department stores, and few earn more than five or six dollars per week.

Going through the house, a visitor is struck with the "hominess" of everything, from the parlor to the smallest bed-room. The house is an old-fashioned four-story basement brick dwelling at 348 West Fourteenth Street, in one of New York's old, but not dilapidated neighborhoods. The blight of the tenement-house as not yet displaced all the comfortable, wide-front old mansions where once dwelt the old citizen and business people of New York. The parlor is furnished very nicely, as better than the so-called drawing-room of many a boarding-house, where the board is three or four times as costly. The upper rooms are all comfortable and attractive, with our white single beds in the larger and a double bed in the side rooms. The spaces at the ends of the wide halls are furnished off and utilized for sleeping purposes.

WORKING GIRLS IN THE HOME PARLOR

Down in the basement there is a pleasant dining-room, where three good substantial meals are served every day. As the house is within walking distance of the business district, the girls are saved the extra expense of car fares. There is a well-equipped laundry also in the basement, where the girls can wash and iron their clothes, and thus save in another direction.

How a woman in New York, earning not more than from four to seven dollars per week, can find a comfortable home is a difficult problem to solve, and leads to one of the darkest and seamiest sides of city life. In 1893, the Rev. Dr. J. A. B. Wilson, tried to find a home for a young girl connected with his church, who managed to live and look respectable upon four dollars per week. Dr. Wilson became interested, and, in looking about for a place for her, he found many doors open for a degraded woman, but none for a respectable girl, who was earning such meagre wages. Desiring to establish a home for such, Dr. Wilson hired a basement, and opened its doors for self-respecting, self-supporting girls. This place was soon outgrown and a larger one secured. At this time, Mr. John S. Huyler became interested in the work, and a little later, Mr. Wm. T. Wardwell became a subscriber, both gentlemen contributing liberally to the work. In 1895, a larger house was found necessary, and the Home was removed to its present quarters. The management was put into the hands of a board of managers, all Christian women, drawn from different churches. During the years that have passed since the Home was opened, hundreds have been cared for, and shelter has been given to many a friendless, home-sick girl. They come from every land, and every State in the Union has been represented.

A constant source of regret to the management is the fact that the Home is not large enough to accommodate the many who apply. A girl is never turned away who is unfortunate in losing her position, but they are carried by the Home sometimes for weeks while they are seeking other employment. Helping women to be respectable, upon wages so small that they cannot live upon them, is a noble work, and should move the hearts of many people who are able to help. It is a work of prevention, an ounce of which is worth a pound of cure. Few people realize the number of girls employed in New York City at salaries below $5 per week, and fewer still realize how hard it is to keep soul and body together upon that sum.

Shall we help the good to remain so, or leave them to such conditions that they will go astray, and then, by a large outlay of money, effort and tears, succeed in winning back only a few, with their bitter memories and shadowed lives?

A rose to the living, is more than sumptuous wreaths for the dead.

Little Invalids by the Sea

I STROLLED southward along Atlantic City's famous board-walk till—somewhat beyond the built-up portions of the city, just at the beginning of Ventnor, and standing close by the sea—the fine, large building of the Children's Seashore House rose before me. Within the building, as well as outside, everything was bright and cheery. Flowers, donated by kindly souls, were placed here and there, for I had chanced upon a gala-day. A musical-tea was going on, and the babies were "receiving." At one door, an ambulance was standing. Several little invalids had arrived, and the wonder and delight in eyes used only to "a yard of blue," attested to the good work that the Seashore House is doing.

Thirty-two years ago, through the efforts of two or three physicians, a small cottage was opened at Atlantic City for the purpose of receiving invalid children. So successful was the undertaking that the following year, 1873, "The Children's Seashore House at Atlantic City, for Invalid Children," was incorporated. It was the first institution of its kind in the United States. Meantime, a lot had been secured at the ocean end of Ohio Avenue, and a large building erected. Here, for twenty-eight years, the work was carried on and greatly increased. The present commodious building was erected, and occupied in 1902.

Positively there was nothing institutional about the "Seashore House;" yet, what did it contain? Baby invalids. The most pathetic things on earth. But somehow the heart was gladdened here when it saw how much was being done for the comfort and healing of the children, and how happy they seemed, though every one of them was in some wise a sufferer.

"What boy are you looking for?" asked one little chap from his bed, as I walked through the ward. More than one little cripple, lying flat on his back and fingering some cherished toy, spoke to me as I passed. I heard not a sob, and the nearest to discord was a scramble among three tots for a nickel that some one had tossed them.

Among the three hundred children, there are naturally some of more than ordinary attractiveness. Little Elizabeth is one of these. She is often seen riding on the shoulders of one of the doctors, or being tossed high in the air by a nurse. Then there are "the twinnies," that were brought in on a stretcher—one at either end. They came from a city hospital and were famished looking little creatures, but are thriving now, and will be sent back to their home, well and almost rosy. I must not forget "St. Michael's Angels," whose story is somewhat like this: "Get beds ready for three from St. Michael's, and all angels," said the matron to a nurse who was helping crippled Joe into his bed. Joe's hip was bad, and he had to lie with a weight attached to his leg and hanging over the foot of the bed. But his eyes were provided for these families at the general table. In this ward I found a number of young babies under a year old. They were all in coaches that had been wheeled to the porch, and an attendant was kept busy refilling bottles, keeping the babies quiet, comfortable and happy. A wing of the building is reserved for children who are sent from day nurseries and other institutions for children. They come forty or fifty at once. When the children arrive in the hospital ward their clothing and such belongings as they bring are cleaned and placed in ventilated lockers, until the little patients are ready to leave, all their needs while at the "House" being supplied. When dinner is announced, it is interesting to see the tots fall in line and march to the dining-room, where some scramble and others are helped to places, at tables graded in height and with appointments suited to young and diminutive diners. Their diet is of the simplest, with bread and milk aplenty. Some of the babies are sound asleep before the meal is ended.

The memorial bed and those supported by the efforts of the children, are particularly beautiful features of the House. A charge of $3 for the mothers, $2.50 for the big girls, and $2 for the children is made, but those who cannot pay it are received without charge, and there is no discrimination as to creed, nationality or color.

In passing an unfrequented corner of the porch, I came upon a group of eight or ten children, and in their midst sat a young doctor, trotting a white baby on one knee and a black one on the other.

Perhaps the merriest feature of the Seashore House is "The Camp," a cluster of tents, where thirty-eight boys are realizing a boy's dream of camping out.

The contribution box—which is always closed when a tea concert is given at the house—is fittingly surmounted by picture of the Madonna and Child. I wondered if there might not be, in the crowded slums of the heated cities many well children who might almost envy these little invalids found eligible for an outing at the Children's Seashore House.

keen and his ears were quick, and as the nurse turned away he called in a low voice, in which awe and exultation blended: "St. Michael's angels is comin' here to-day." The "angels" came—two sickly little negroes, with shiny eyes and crinkled hair, and a blanched little typhoid convalescent. A modern Raphael would scarcely choose them for models of cherubs, but—as "St. Michael's Angels" they are known.

Crossing the sands, where a multitude of urchins were digging in sand-heaps and building forts, I entered the cottages known as the "Mothers' Cottages," where a mother, for the sum of three dollars a week, may come with her invalid child, and may, at a little more expense, bring one or two of her well children with her. A matron inspects the cottages to see that they are kept clean, and that meals are 1862 he returned to Louisville, and succeeded the Rev. Dr. Everts in the pastorate of the Walnut Street Church. In 1870, Dr. Lorimer was called to the Tremont Temple (Baptist), in Boston, and while there he engaged in journalistic work on the Denominational organs. In 1879 he accepted a call to the First Baptist Church, in Chicago, succeeding for the second time to the pulpit of Dr. Everts. At the earnest solicitation of his Boston church, he resigned his Chicago pastorate and returned to Boston, where the membership rapidly grew until it attained the number of three thousand.

Dr. Lorimer was called to the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, of New York, in September, 1901. The Boston church again urged him to return to them, but he felt that he had a work to do in New York, and decided to remain. His ministry was highly successful, especially among young people, who were attracted by his bright, cheery disposition and his eloquent preaching.

Though his pastoral duties claimed most of his attention Dr. Lorimer found time to write. Among the books from his pen are The Galilean, The Great Conflict, The Argument of Christianity, Messages of To-day for Men of To-morrow, and Christianity and the Social State. His last book, The Master of Millions, attracted considerable attention when it was published last year.

THE LATE REV. GEORGE C. LORIMER

THE LATE DR. LORIMER

SAD intelligence comes by cable from Aix les Bains, France, which will cause deep sorrow in many a home in this country. It announces the death of Dr. George C. Lorimer, pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, New York, and for twenty-one years pastor of the Tremont Temple Church, Boston. Dr. Lorimer had been in ill-health for several months, but had so far improved that it was believed a short stay at the famous health resort in Southern France would complete his full restoration. He had planned a series of sermons on the Parables and an active campaign for the coming winter, and his church was eagerly anticipating his return, when the brief cable message on Sept. 8 announced his death. In New York and Boston, in both of which cities he was highly respected and sincerely beloved, his death is deeply deplored. Our readers all over the country will regret his departure, for his sermons, which have frequently appeared in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, were read with interest and profit.

Dr. Lorimer was a Scotchman by birth. He first saw the light in Edinburgh in 1838. His father died while his famous son was an infant. His mother contracted a second marriage with the manager of a theatre, and the boy grew up with the expectation of becoming an actor. With his stepfather he came to this country, and took boys' parts on the stage. He was, however, of an adventurous temperament, and soon quitted the stage for a seafaring life. After a few voyages before the mast, he tired of the sea, and, returning to America, he again joined the theatrical profession, appearing in Louisville, Ky., and St. Louis, Mo.

While staying at Louisville, Ky., the young man one day strolled into the Walnut Street Baptist Church. He was deeply impressed by the sermon and went again and again. He was at last brought to Christ and joined the church. His brilliant oratorical gifts, and his unbounded zeal, soon attracted the notice of the Church, and indicated the ministry as the sphere of his life. He was sent to Georgetown College, and before being graduated he began his career as a preacher. His first charge was at Harrodsburg, Ky. In

THE GIRL WHO FOUNDED A COLLEGE

Mattie Perry, Farmer's Daughter, and Her Wonderful Work of Faith and Prayer

YOUNG BIBLE STUDENTS IN UNIFORM

STUDENTS IN FRONT OF THE ELHANAN HOME

IN THE SEWING ROOM

FIVE years ago, there came to Marion, N. C., a delicate-looking young woman, Miss Mattie Perry, who purchased a large unfinished hotel, and opened a home school for the poor and helpless. According to the testimony of the townspeople, this woman's influence for good has been almost marvelous. Not only has she cared for and educated many youths and poor children who were without a friend in the world, but numbers of men and women whose lives were well-nigh wrecked by drink, have been reclaimed through her influence, and are now leading sober and industrious lives. There are children in the school from a number of States, and even from Mexico. During the past year 140 pupils, most of whom are destitute orphans, children of drunkards and outcast women, have been fed, clothed, and taught at Elhanan, as the institution is named. The school was founded, and has been maintained for five years by the unsolicited charity of the public. The plain, old-fashioned faith of the Bible, and a most exalted piety and consecration are taught by the example and life of this frail little woman, whose faith has well-nigh moved mountains in building up this wonderful work of saving the bodies and souls of helpless ones. Her own story is most interesting, and goes far to show that the Lord helps those that help themselves, when they are working unselfishly for others. Alone, and unaided, Miss Perry has prayed and worked until she has accomplished an amazing amount of good. But she is not yet satisfied; there is still so much to do.

In a recent interview, Miss Mattie Perry told the strange story of how she was led to take up this work.

"I was a farmer's daughter," said she, "born of Christian parents. At a very early age I gave myself to God, and knew that I was his child. When I was sixteen, I believed I had a call as a missionary to China; but I was mistaken, and my Heavenly Father showed me that there was other work for me to do. I heard the command, 'Go ye,' and I then began the work which was nearest at hand among my own brothers and sisters and near neighbors. I told them of Jesus and his love, and many were led to his feet.

"I was dull in books, and the one ambition of my life was to know God, and to be used by him to help others. I prayed and studied as I went about my work, and during all my leisure moments. Twice I knocked at college doors, and was told there was no room, because of my empty purse; but—I continued praying, studying and expecting, until at last a college door was opened to me without my knocking. It was through my pastor, Rev. A. A. Gilbert, of the S. C. C., that Rev. S. Lander, President of Williamston Female College, wrote me to come at an expense of $2.50 per week; but I could not pay that, and he took a collection among the students of the college, amounting to $25, and wrote me to come. So I went, rejoicing, with $2.50 in my purse, and had only been there a few days, when Mrs. Sally Rogers called at the college, and having been told about me, she met the remainder of my expenses, and left a donation of $1,000 in her will for my education. I overworked, and became an invalid; but I still endeavored to leave no stone unturned to be ready for service.

When only able to sit up for recitations, and unable to see to read my lessons, I continued in school for a while, through the kindness of classmates, who read for me. I felt that if I did my best, God who made me willing to work, would also make me able, and he did.

"After leaving college, I was desirous of a better knowledge of the Bible, and made application to two Bible schools, only to be met by refusals. A third accepted me, but it was so far away that I could not get

I prayed on this subject steadily for two years. I trusted Him for everything necessary to establish a co-educational, interdenominational industrial school. I looked to Him for guidance as to location, finances, and everything needed.

"My attention was called to an unfinished building, containing about 100 rooms, one mile from Marion, N. C., on the Southern Railway. The building was well adapted to the work I had in view, and was in a locality favorable for health. The country was high and rolling, the water most excellent, and the climate bracing and conducive to physical and mental development. Confident in Divine help, I started with about enough money to buy my ticket one way, from Columbia, S. C., to Marion, N. C., to purchase the Catawba Hotel, not knowing where the money was to come from, only that the Lord had said, 'Go,' and he would provide. When I reached Marion, I had $200 and had $84 more pledged for me. I made the purchase July 11, 1898. It was a huge skeleton of a house. I took the titles with a first payment of $300. The roof and brick foundation had to be repaired, and I wished to fit some of the empty rooms, so that we could open school by January, 1899; but I had no money. On August 30, 1898, at Indian Springs, Ga., I talked on missions and closed with an appeal for prayer for those who, like myself, had only lives to give, and Brother McConnell contributed $25 and took a collection for Elhanan. Rev. T. W. Garbutt gave six carloads of first-class lumber. A minister gave books from his library. Some made up boxes of bedding and others contributed money, among them a little girl of five, who volunteered to give $5 in gold, and who said, 'I wanted to give it to you.'

"Upon reaching Marion, I found contributions in the mail amounting to $145, but I still needed $330, and it was not many hours of prayer and waiting before it came. We had fifty-six acres of land, a debt of three thousand dollars, and twenty-two available rooms, very uncomfortable and scantily furnished. The cold mountain air gathered in the second and third stories through the open windows, and swept down upon us. My own room was so cold that ink froze.

"Now all these early troubles are past, though we still need all the help our friends can give us—there is so much yet to be done.

During the first five years the number of our charges constantly increased, and this year we have averaged more than one hundred. About ten of our charter pupils have been engaged in Christian work, two of whom went to Africa as missionaries, viz: Mr. and Mrs. W. R. McDuffie. One of the second year—Miss Mattie Long—is in India as a missionary; and another is under appointment for South America, while many others have a call and are preparing for China and other countries. Some are evangelizing, some filling appointments in abandoned churches, schoolhouses, and cottages, some are teaching, and others are making an honest living by the sweat of their brow."

This work is in every way deserving of the support of Christian people, and any who may be interested in aiding a faithful worker in a good cause may communicate with Miss Mattie Perry, Elhanan, Marion, N. C.

a ticket to go. I prayed, distributed tracts, visited the poor, sick and the needy, and did all the Church gave me to do, and it was in this way that I found myself a volunteer city missionary, and was advised by a pastor to apply to the church for a position as city missionary. I did, and was not accepted. They said, 'We cannot pay you.' I continued to work, and taught a class of working young people at night for my expenses.

The Force of Example

BAD, like good example, is infectious, only a little more so. Bishop Potter is already having his imitators, and "consecrated saloons" threaten to be by no means a rarity in the near future. Minneapolis is the new candidate for notoriety of this undesirable character, and the pastor of a local church there is to be the patron under whose beneficent wing the model Tavern will shortly be dedicated. It should be explained that the Western place will have a theatre in the same building and a common entrance will serve for the two, the "consecrated saloon" being in the lobby. Incidentally, it should also be stated that the saloon-keeper is a rich man, who, in return for the favor of conducting a dedicatory service, has agreed to build a church for his pastor patron. What a compact! It lacks but one thing to make it perfect: the church should be built so that the same entrance would serve for all three. It strikes us that this would be the proper entrance to such a church.

But the true Church of Christ—the great body of His followers who are earnestly striving to keep themselves "unspotted from the world," and to win souls from sin, will view with loathing and repulsion this new development of the saloon evil. In the past our Churches have fought the saloon and all its train, tooth and nail; but now the drinking bar insinuates itself alongside of the pew, and seeks to "clothe itself in the very livery of heaven," in order that its soul-and-body-wrecking business may flourish.

This new development is an evil that must be combated stoutly and promptly by the Christian pulpits and pews of our land. It is not a thing to be mocked at, for it strikes at the very heart and spiritual life of the Church. If a minister of the Gospel connives with the saloon, or gives it the slightest toleration or encouragement, the end of that ministry is not far off.

For the glory of God and the welfare of humanity, the Church must have no saloon alliances. The same cruel mill that grinds out drunkards will grind up any congregation, church, pastor, people, and pews, together—and will never stop grinding till the ruin is complete.

The Sad Side of Strikes

WHATEVER arguments may be brought to bear upon the subject of strikes, whatever of justice or injustice on the side of employers or employees, one phase always stands out with pathetic distinctness. It is the sorrowful fact that the real sufferers are the striker's wife and children. The striker himself is sustained by the sense of the heroic struggle he is making. He is generally conscious that he is denying himself, in order that he may secure justice for himself and his fellow-workmen. He knows that it is a cruel necessity, but it is often the only means within his power of enforcing his rights. Recognizing that fact, he girds himself for the struggle, and bravely makes the sacrifice demanded. But the thought that cuts him to the heart is that he cannot bear all the suffering. The wife and children whom he loves will have to suffer with him. It is consideration for them and the suffering a strike will entail upon them, that often makes a man willing to endure injustice rather than resort to a strike.

Few working men have a few dollars laid by for the rainy day—as their wages are usually barely sufficient to cover current expenses, in these days of high rents and inflated prices for necessary commodities. By the time the rent is paid, provision and grocery bills settled, and clothing supplied, John's wage is extremely attenuated. Even when Mary is the best of managers—and the majority of workingmen's wives are good housekeepers—when a strike is declared, although she is loyal ever to her "man," and does all she can to encourage him, yet her heart sinks at the prospect of days and weeks, perhaps months, when there is no looking forward to pay-day, which brings a renewal of the necessities of life. Should there have been a little hoard carefully saved and treasured, how soon it dwindles and melts, and how every penny is counted, and every expense possible eliminated.

The workingman is very fond of seeing his wife and children well dressed, and when he takes them for an outing, with what pride he regards them, from Mary in her new suit and big hat, all down the line of nicely dressed boys and girls, to the lace-capped baby in arms.

When a long strike is on, all must suffer. The clothing becomes worn and shabby; the children's toes come peeping through their shoes, for with all her art and industry at making and mending, Mary has never learned the cobbler's trade. Soon all little luxuries disappear from the table, and even coarse food becomes scanty; the landlord is clamorous—he has no sympathy with strikes—then the comfortable flat is exchanged for rooms in a cheaper neighborhood, and in time even this must give way to any sort of shelter that can be found, though it be but one room. John keeps his courage up as well as he can; but when he comes home and sees his wife's sad, worn face, it takes all his resolution to justify the sacrifice he is forced to make. Meantime, the bonds of poverty are drawn tighter and tighter, strangling the happy home-life, and even after the strike is over, it requires a long time for the disintegrated parts of that family to again assemble and attain the state of content and comfort which was theirs before John "went out."

Conqueror or Captive

IT is the old story of the man who said to his commanding officer, "I have taken a prisoner." "Bring him along," replied the officer. "He won't let me." "Come yourself then." "I can't."

Men think they have conquered the world when it yields them the things they want, and all the while it has conquered and captivated them. The world is like a mettlesome, powerful horse—a grand thing for joy and service to the rider as long as he is absolute master of the beast, but how terrible for him if, through carelessness, he loses the reins.

Rule the world and you may get the deepest delight out of it; you can make it help you to be wiser, gentler, nobler, more gracious, more Christ-like, more full of God. But let it once get the bit in its teeth, and you are gone. Many a man says, "It is mine—this money I have got; this social or this political position I have won; this cup of pleasure which I lift to my lips at will;" when only the truth would be spoken if one and all of these should rise up and say, "Thou fool—thou art mine!"

Out to Grass

THESE are the days of strange vagaries concerning many things. It is an age of new theories that strike at the foundation of old-established usages and upset many preconceived notions. What would our forefathers have thought of the great revolution which the latest dietetic reformers assure us has already begun, and which they say will not only vegetarianize society, but will ultimately induce us to eat our vegetables raw! "Why should I make myself a hecatomb for dead beasts?" urges the advocate of a no-meat diet, as he proceeds to solace himself with a menu of wheat, barley, rye and oats, mixed with cream and topped off with fruit. But even he is eclipsed by the newest and boldest innovator of them all—a foreign savant, who comes to our shores to teach us how to live and thrive upon grass! For months, if the reports are to be credited, he has lived on this juicy herbage exclusively. He naturally wonders why the rest of mankind do not see the advantages of such a diet, especially as it is so plentiful.

With the distinguished example of Nebuchadnezzar in mind, one cannot help thinking there might be cases in which this severe regimen would be a not unwelcome change. Public men who are much sought after, and especially distinguished, after-dinner orators, staled with repeated indulgence in a tempting but too rich cuisine, might find mental and physical reinvigoration in being "turned out to grass," once in awhile. As for the great army of dyspeptics, the gourmets, the gluttons, and those "high livers" who never know the sauce of hunger, what intellectual and moral reformation might not be possible, if they would only embrace the new idea.

As for ourselves—well, we will merely remark that our native modesty forbids us taking too prominent a part in this grass-eating reform. We are satisfied to let somebody else take the honors while we content ourselves by sticking to the simple fare of our ancestors, the plain old roast and boiled, with its humble garnishings. We are not unappreciative, however, of the fact that this diet reform is a big subject, and we are thankful that there is grass enough to go around, so that all who desire to try it as an economical and steady diet may have an opportunity to do so.

The Work Done at St. Louis

SO many of our readers were intensely interested in the work of the Exposition Travelers' Aid Committee when it was begun in the spring, that it is due to them that they should know something in detail of the work as it has been carried on during the summer. With the Committee were the following co-operating organizations:

The International Board of Women's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the American Committee Affiliated with the World's Y. W. C. A., the Girls' Friendly Society of America, the Women's Auxiliary of the American Bible Society, Council of Jewish Women, the Travelers' Aid Society of Philadelphia, Dominican Home of Retreats and Catholic Guild, Philadelphia; Catholic Working Girls' Club (Sisters of the Divine Compassion), International Order of the King's Sons and Daughters, the International Society, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The imperative object of the Committee was to spread broadcast warning against advertisements for employment or lodgings in St. Louis, either in person or by means of local papers, and to give directions for the safeguarding of young women who, eager to improve what would be presented to them as a golden opportunity for sight-seeing and securing pleasant occupation at high wages, might be induced to take the risk of going to St. Louis without protection, or means of escape from the dangers that menace every girl who ventures alone into large cities, especially under the inevitable conditions attending an Exposition. Large placards were printed and everywhere distributed in public places, warning young girls, and telling them what to do and where to go in their journey to St. Louis. Fifteen thousand of these placards in French, German and Slavic were conspicuously posted in railway terminals, steamboat landings, and stations on various operating lines. Pastors of churches co-operated and the press gave its most efficient aid.

Over eighty-thousand copies of a leaflet entitled "Information" addressed to young women going to St. Louis, have been distributed. Two editions of the leaflet prepared by Mrs. Sangster, entitled "Real Danger and Real Need," have been expended and another large edition is now in process of distribution. Five cities have reported the establishment of permanent Travelers' Aid Agencies as a return of this effort. In many cities and towns local committees have undertaken the work of the Travelers' Aid Committee.

Among the numbers befriended during a typical ten days, there were six hundred girls received at the Home in St. Louis. Of these, two hundred and fifty-three were entirely alone, one hundred entirely without money. Thirty-five stranded girls were cared for at the expense of the Committee. Sixty-five were provided for, or, through employment, obtained money. Two thousand girls have, during the summer, called at the Home, to be personally directed to safe lodging places; the daily average being about twenty-five. The expenses of The Traveler's Aid Committee have been met by personal gifts. They have amounted to $3,891.03. The disbursements up to August 12th, have been $1,497.20. The good work will continue until the close of the Fair.

Too much praise cannot be given to Dr. Anna L. Brown, who has so efficiently carried on the work at headquarters during the summer. Thanks are also due to the friends in St. Louis, who have stood valiantly at their posts.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

An Error Cheerfully Corrected

Our attention has been called to an unfortunate and erroneous statement, contained in our Crown Encyclopedia, to the effect that Dr. Charles A. Eastman and his wife, formerly Elaine Goodale, were divorced soon after their marriage. This statement is entirely incorrect, and is one of those accidental errors that will sometimes occur, notwithstanding the utmost care on the part of the editors of an encyclopedia.

New Work in Korea

COMMISSIONER STEVENS

ONE of the most important objects sought by Japan in the present war with Russia, is that of preventing Korea falling under the domination of her enemy or of any other European power. Japan disclaims the intention of adding Korea to her own dominions, but desires that Japanese influence shall have full play in the development of the country. With this end in view, she has decided to appoint an agent in Korea to advise the Emperor of that country, specially as to his relations with foreign governments. The man selected for this responsible post by the Japanese Emperor, is Mr. Durham White Stevens, an American, who has been in the service of the Japanese Government for many years. The selection of an American rather than a Japanese for the post is doubtless to confirm the impression Japan wishes to make, that all countries are to have equal privileges as to trade in Korea and that its independence will be maintained. If a subject of Japan were appointed, he could be regarded as a dictator, whereas an American, however devoted he may be to Japanese interests, is a representative of fair play and progressive development. Mr. Stevens informed the New York Herald, to whose courtesy we are indebted for his portrait, that he expects to sail for his new sphere of labor on October 2.

An evidence of the democratic spirit of the Korean government, the ceremony of which a picture appears on this page. It is the presentation to the Emperor of Korea of a number of foreign newspaper correspondents. The dignity of an Asiatic potentate in former times would not have recognized such persons, but Japanese influence is already breaking down the barriers of caste and the correspondents were received with complete cordiality. The journals of America, England, France, Germany, Austria and Italy were all represented in the party, and were presented with due formality to the Korean Emperor, who received them with gracious courtesy.

A glance at the map will show the importance that Korea is likely to have, when the present war is terminated. Japan in taking it under tutelage is likely to insure its material prosperity, as well as gaining for herself an extension of her own trade. We can but hope that other nations will take an interest in the spiritual concerns of its people, and that the American missionaries who have for many years been laboring there, will have elp in propagating the Christian faith there.

They shall come and declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born (Ps. 22: 31).

A Disappointed Thief

Among criminal records a curious case has come to light through a criminal's attempt at blackmail. In his talks about Chicago, he had noticed the carelessness of a grocery firm, who left on the sidewalk bags of coffee ill after dusk. He saw how easy it would be to carry off one or two and the temptation overcame him. He hired a horse and wagon, paying two dollars for the use of it, and drove up to the place where the coffee bags were stacked. He took two of them, put them in the wagon and drove away. He deposited them in a safe place and returned the wagon to its owner. When he returned to examine his plunder he found, to his disgust, that the bags, though marked, "Coffee," were filled with sand. The firm had added a few bags of that worthless material to their mound in order to impress passers-by with the extent of their dealings in coffee. The thief was so exasperated by the failure of his scheme, that he wrote the grocery firm threatening to expose their device unless they reimbursed him with the two dollars he had lost. He had discovered that the prophet's warning applied to dishonest people in these times.

He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end shall be a fool (Jer. 17: 11).

Crushed by a Tombstone

A tragic death occurred in Washington Cemetery, Brooklyn, on Sept. 8. It was that of a Hebrew girl eighteen years of age, who was crushed under the tombstone of her sister. She had been away in the Catskills in the hope of recovering her health, which had been impaired by prolonged grief over her sister's death. The two girls were twins and had been tenderly attached to one another. It is two years since one of them died. The other was broken-hearted and it row, she had learned not to go to the grave for relief, but had looked for help to Him who succors the bereaved, as was taught by the prophet of her race.

Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a sure foundation (Isa. 28: 16).

A Ludicrous Advertisement

An enterprising firm in the French capital have devised a novel mode of advertising. A short time ago a man entered a restaurant on the Paris boulevards at a time in the day when it was crowded with diners. When he removed his hat a scalp, completely bald, was disclosed. On it was painted in artistic letters the advertisement of the firm. The novelty attracted the attention of every one in the restaurant, which, of course was the object desired. The idea became public talk and the ingenuity of the mode of advertising was highly praised. The firm's competitors chagrined at being beaten by the novel scheme, promptly imitated it, and on the next evening, in many restaurants, there was a similar exhibition. It was soon discovered, however, that some of them were deceptions. The men were not bald but were wearing scalp wigs. They were exposed by the wigs being snatched from their heads and ran away to escape the jeers of the spectators. One of the men who was really bald, also got into trouble. The French Government imposes a tax on advertisements, and a revenue collector arrested the man as an unlicensed advertisement. The men must have been very lacking in self-respect to have consented to let their bodies be used for advertising purposes. There are, however, many who would scorn to do such a thing, who really become unconscious advertisements of the potent effects of the liquors they imbibe.

Who hath wounds without cause? Who hath redness of eyes? They that tarry long at the wine (Prov. 23: 29).

A Huge Meteor

A startling occurrence is reported from Minnesota. People who were in the streets of St. Paul about midnight recently, saw a strange light in the sky. It grew brighter, and was traveling with extraordinary speed. It was evidently an enormous meteor, and had come under the earth's attraction. Several persons were awakened by the wonderful light, and the strange, whizzing noise, as of a cannon-ball. It passed over the city, and finally struck the earth in a country district between Kenyon and Randolph. The shock of its impact was felt for several miles around. When found, it was still at almost white heat, and it was imbedded thirty feet in the earth. Its weight, judging from its size, was estimated at three tons, but not until its texture has been analyzed can an accurate idea be formed.

Several fragments are to be broken off for submission to scientists for examination so that we may learn of what elements it is composed. It has probably been flung off from some far-distant celestial body by a gigantic convulsion. It may be possible from the analysis of some of these strange visitants from the skies to learn what are the conditions on the luminaries we see above us. Happily for us, we have other and more reliable means of learning more important facts about the heavenly country reserved for the children of God.

There shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away (Rev. 21: 4).

BRIEF NOTES

The American Boys' School at Erzeroum, Turkey, has been destroyed by fire. It is only eight months since the girls' school was similarly destroyed. There is no doubt of both calamities being the result of Moslem fanaticism.

A lady Nihilist, daughter of a medical professor, was employed by the Empress of Russia to pack books for the use of wounded Russian soldiers. She inserted a Nihilist leaflet in each book. She has been detected, and sentenced to death.

RECEPTION OF FOREIGN NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS BY THE EMPEROR OF KOREA

was feared that her sorrow would cause her death or unseat her reason. The first thing she did after her return was to visit her sister's grave, as she had been in the habit of doing frequently. Three Jewish rabbis accompanied her. They offered prayers as they knelt on the slab covering the grave. When they rose from their knees, the girl threw herself on the slab sobbing and wailing. Presently she recovered her composure sufficiently to offer a prayer. She attempted to rise when she had finished her petitions, and feeling weak from agitation, took hold of the shaft at the head of the grave to help herself to her feet. The shaft had been set insecurely and the ground beneath one side had settled. The girl's slight weight was sufficient to upset the tottering shaft and it fell upon her. The stone struck her on the head, and when it was raised it was found that her skull was fractured and she was dead. The poor girl was the victim of carelessness on the part of some workman who should have laid a better foundation for the shaft. It was a sad coincidence that she should have been there when it fell and that her own hands should have brought it down. How much better it would have been for her if, in her sor-

THE TWO CAPTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

Author of "The Southerners," "A Doctor of Philosophy," "Hohenzollern," etc., etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the Marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old Marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the Marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the Marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the Marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the Marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope of winning her love; though, both being prisoners, the outlook is anything but encouraging.

AS for that young woman, the situation was at once delightful and miserable. She reveled in happiness when she permitted herself to listen to Macartney, yet she was very miserable when she thought of the hopelessness of their passion. Her grandfather, it was evident, would never consent to a union between them. She clung fondly to the idea that she had dedicated herself to France, although her purpose became more and more feeble. Consequently, her treatment of her lover was as variable as the weather. Sometimes she smiled upon him; sometimes she listened to him; sometimes she met his schemes to be alone with her, with a frankness, a tenderness, and a dexterity as well, that lifted him to the seventh heaven. At other times, she beamed upon him from afar, in a way which elated while it baffled him. At intervals she was as cold as ice to him, nay, colder than her grandfather, who was always considerate and kind. She was as elusive, as variable, as changeable as the shade cast by the trembling aspen leaf.

He had loved her, in his absence, with one of those rare passions which turned native fickleness into absolute fidelity. He had loved her while he could only dream of her; but when he was constantly in her presence, when she stood before him as the realization of his visions—well, the feelings he had felt for her before were not to be mentioned with the emotions he experienced now.

There were interviews between Garron and the vice-admiral in the cabin, after the fleet had anchored at Aboukir. The vice-admiral never told the details of these conversations. He would come out of the cabin with as jaunty a step, as composed a mien, as he had when he had entered it. It was not until he was safe in his own cabin that he gave way to fits of terrible, if impotent, rage, which left him shaken to the core.

The proud old noble would have died a thousand times rather than submit to such treatment for a moment; he would have starved himself to death, opened his veins with his teeth, had he been alone; but there was his granddaughter, there was his grandson, there was France. He had to live and suffer. Again and again he would have leaped upon Garron, and in the fury of his passion, great, hulking brute though his tormentor was, have torn him to pieces with his old and feeble hands. But he never saw Garron alone. Always with him was the silent Brébœuf.

Brébœuf stood high in the favor of his captain, for he never talked to anyone. The captain even had a pallet spread for him at his cabin door, and he was the most trusted man of his crew. Pistol in hand, he stood back of his new master, with immobile countenance marking the humiliation of the marquis.

"Macartney turned and looked at her, and Louise shrank back"

Toward the latter part of July, Macartney being completely recovered, Garron sent for him to come to his cabin. Greatly surprised, the Irishman presented himself before his captor, who was attended, as usual, by his watchful guard.

"Citizen Mac—"

"Pardon," interrupted Macartney coolly, "I am no citizen of France. Your customs do not interest me. You will therefore call me captain, or, to be more exact, commodore, my rank in the English navy."

"Very well, Monsieur le Chef d'Escadre," said Garron, smiling in a way that he meant to be ingratiating, "as you please. I am beginning to take less interest in the present customs of France, monsieur, than I formerly did. I speak to you in strictest confidence, of course?"

"I do not wish for your confidences, Monsieur Garron," said Macartney quickly.

"No? Perhaps you will, however, when I tell you that they intimately concern the English."

He looked meaningfully at Macartney as he spoke. Instantly there flashed into the Irishman's mind that Garron was not staunch in his devotion to the cause to which he had engaged himself. If through him might secure his freedom and a chance to assist the de Vaudémonts! If he could get to Nelson! Macartney came a step nearer Garron, and, leaning his hand upon the table, bent closer to him.

"What do you mean?"

"Have I your word, never to breathe what I am about to tell you to a living soul without my permission?"

"You forget," said Macartney, pointing to Brébœuf, "that we are not alone."

"I forget nothing. This man is deaf, dumb and blind in my service. You will give me your word, monsieur?"

"I will. What is it you would say?"

"Captain Macartney," said Garron, sinking his voice to a whisper, "many of us are not satisfied with affairs in France."

"You would bring back the king," whispered Macartney.

"As to that, later. This General Bonaparte has virtually made himself king of France. The Republic, sir, is in danger. Should he succeed in the expedition, he would be the Dictator of my beloved country. The principles for which we patriots have fought, which we have established at so great an expenditure of blood and treasure are in danger of being subverted, monsieur. The Republic!"

"Oh, hang the Republic!" said Macartney, impatiently. He was not much of a diplomatist, evidently. "What are you driving at?"

"Bonaparte will be master of France," said Garron, quietly, shrugging his shoulders. "As between Bonaparte and ——" He hesitated.

"And the king!"

"As a patriot, monsieur, loving my country, who would not see her dragged in the train of this Corsican adventurer—I in short, monsieur, you have hit exactly."

"What do you propose?"

"I propose to let you go free; to furnish you with means to find Admiral Nelson and the English ships; to take Tonnant out of the line of battle where they fall upon us, and surrender her to you. To use my influence to see that the fleet stays here in Aboukir, in about the worst position possible for defense and entirely unprepared, as it is now."

"What do you want for this?"

"I should like, first of all, a free pardon for anything of which I may be— unjustly accused, a patent of nobility, and a pension of ten thousand francs a year."

"I have no power," said Macartney, "to pledge anything for the king of France."

"No, monsieur, doubtless not; but you think the king of France would refuse any request that you might make of him about the downfall of this General Bonaparte and his own restoration?"

"Probably not," said the Irishman. "That isn't all I can do," said Garron. "There is plan on foot to abduct Bonaparte. A grandson of the man Vaudémont, one of your fellow prisoners, is the head and front of the conspiracy. Those concerned in it are desperate men, and, I have no doubt, it will be brought about in the near future. I can prevent the success of that plot."

"How?" asked Macartney curiously, who knew the facts very well, but wanted to hear what Garron had to say for himself.

"By sending Bonaparte a certain paper." He callously lifted a document from the table before him, he spoke. "I found a certain incriminating account in the baggage of the man Vaudémont. If we enter upon this undertaking, I shall not send the paper."

"Will you also release the Marquis de Vaudémont and his granddaughter?"

"Not for all the kings of France!"

"If harm should come to them, it would go hard with you after the restoration."

"No one could blame me, Monsieur Macartney, if the marquis should die, let us say, of the Egyptian fever, in spite of all my care and attention on this point."

"But his granddaughter?"

"The natural grief of so devoted a maiden would count for her taking off, in spite of all my efforts to console her."

"Heavens!" exclaimed Macartney, starting forward. "When he restrained himself. 'Would you murder her?'" he cried.

"They have an easy way to purchase life and liberty."

"What is that?"

"Let the woman become the wife of Jean Garron and the old man may go free. I should value a father-in-law, such as he, in the court of His Majesty King Louis XVII."

"I won't do it!" cried Macartney.

"Think, monsieur," said Garron; "you go free! You save your country and save the king of France. You bring Admiral Nelson's fleet upon us instantly. You risk no risk. I have an order here, signed by Admiral Bruys, for a boat to leave the fleet to go to Alexandria. Why should you refuse?"

"Nelson would give his soul almost for the news that Macartney could give him. Yes, his own course was clear. He must go! But how could he avail himself of the offer and leave Louise de Vaudémont to the mercy of the brute before him. His duty drove him to accept Garron's proposition. His affections held him irrevocably to the ship."

As yet Garron had not the slightest suspicion as to why the man before him hesitated. The Frenchman did not dream of his prisoner's passion for Louise de Vaudémont. He wondered, therefore, why he did not accept his offer at once. Macartney was unable to announce the inevitable decision.

"Monsieur," he said at last, "I must have time. I must think over this matter. Give me a day!"

"Time is very precious, Monsieur le Capitaine," said the Frenchman persuasively.

"A few hours then. Until this evening? I could not stay away in any event until nightfall."

"Very well, monsieur. You shall have until this evening," said Garron. "Why you hesitate I know not, but your English were ever incomprehensible. I give your word of honor that you will say nothing about this—nothing to anyone?"

"You have," said Macartney, turning abruptly on his heel and leaving the cabin.

CHAPTER XXI

THE REJECTION OF THE COMTESSE

MACARTNEY was literally in a desperate situation, and the most terrible part of it was that he could see absolutely no way, first of all, to help the woman he loved; and second, to avoid accepting Garron's proposition. Nelson had stood him to find the French fleet. He had found and had been taken prisoner in the endeavor. The treachery of one of the French commanders opened a way for his escape. Nelson was groping around in the Mediterranean for that fleet. The chances were, that Macartney got away from Alexandria, he could get word to the admiral in some way.

To get that word to Nelson was vital to the future of England. Unless that French fleet were destroyed, was evident that Bonaparte would overrun the East. England would be struck in her most vulnerable point. It was absolutely impossible and unthinkable that Macartney should refrain from availing himself of this opportunity to serve his country. Every consideration of duty and honor demanded that he accept Garron's proposition immediately.

A few years before, Macartney might have hesitated to his course, but the refining influence of a great passion had been upon him since he had met Louise de Vaudémont. He had been uplifted, ennobled, by his love for her. He saw things more clearly. Love blinds, but it also enlightens. He was a much finer man since he had dreamed dreams with the comtesse in the centre of his visions.

He knew and realized instantly Garron's proposition is made to him that he must accept it. Whatever the prospective fate of any individual, however dear at individual might be, the claims of duty were paramount. She had been for France, he must be for England. Yet, to leave her to Garron! It killed him. If he could only tell her! If he could only give her a hint, indicate in the faintest way the feelings that were his being, the reasons that actuated him. But he is bound, he had given his word of honor.

In honor bound! Why should Macartney respect a word of which Garron thought nothing? Why, in dealing with a traitor should an upright man be bound by honor, while the other party was moved by nothing but base self-interest? Could it be shown for a moment to Garron's satisfaction that his interest lay in betraying Macartney and the English, Macartney knew at there would be no hesitation as to the Frenchman's course.

could say no word to her, not even of warning. The marquis was old. He maintained a bold front toward the man he hated, but even he did not realize how he was depending upon and trusting to Macartney. In the most desperate strait in which a man may find himself, threatened with the loss of everything, the old man had turned to the young man as a saviour. Macartney knew he must go and leave them to their fate without a word, a sign. He could not do it! What was England? What was Duty? What was Honor, that such a sacrifice should be exacted from him? A word, an ideal—abstractions! He would not go!

As he stood on the quarter-deck alone, staring out over the waste of sand on the desert shore, tremulous in the heat of the late afternoon, there rose before him two visions. They ranged themselves on either side of him. One shaped itself into the beautiful features and noble figure of the woman he loved. That baseless fabric of a vision represented to him that which he most desired; that for which pledges have been forfeited, duties neglected, honor destroyed; that for which lands have been laid desolate, kingdoms have been won and lost, since time and the world began—the love of woman! On the other hand, there stood by him, a pale, sorrowful, slender, appealing figure, with melancholy eyes looking at him from under a broad brow, topped with a shock of dark hair—Nelson! And the pointing finger said, "Duty! duty!"

He buried his face in his hands to shut out the wraiths, and the voice of the woman he loved broke upon his ear.

"You are sad, monsieur. You look across the sands and dream of home, perhaps?"

"Not of home," answered the man hoarsely.

He turned and looked at her. She shrank back in surprise at what she saw. The turmoil in his soul had left its imprint upon his face. But at the sight of her there, in flesh and blood, close by him, another look leaped in his eyes; one more familiar, tinged with despair, one she knew and loved. Ah, well the woman realized of whom he had been dreaming then. But what had caused him such unwonted agitation? He had been so cheerful, so light-hearted, so debonair, so hopeful! Now she saw him crushed, broken. He had just come from Garron. What had happened?

"Monsieur," she said quickly, "you look—what is the matter? Does some danger threaten you?"

"None. Would it did!"

"Why then do you—there some new peril for—grandfather—or—myself?"

"Was not the old enough?"

"Monsieur," she said, laying her hand timidly upon his arm. Where he stood he screened her from observation, had there been any curious in the fore part of the ship. "Monsieur, you believe that—I—I am your friend? Tell me, what has altered you?"

"Mademoiselle, will you answer me as you might answer a man facing death?"

"Death, monsieur?"

"Death to hope, death to the heart, mademoiselle, nothing more."

"Speak on."

"Will you put aside for the moment—what shall I say?—the reluctance you have manifested, to listen to me?"

"I will listen."

"And will you answer?"

There was something so direct, so compelling in his gaze, that in spite of herself, Louise could not deny him. Not trusting herself to speak, she gently inclined her head.

"I love you. It's an old tale, told many times in your ear. I ask you now, do you believe that?"

There was a sob in the girl's throat.

"I—yes, I believe," she murmured.

"Do you believe that I love you more than everything that men hold dear? That you are the very light of heaven to me? To lose you, to part from you tears the soul out of me! You have told me many times, and I have resented the telling, that you were for France. I understand what you mean now. You are not for me. There was a higher claim, a more powerful appeal. It broke my heart to hear you say that—Louise."

The quick twilight of the Orient was already upon them. In the dusk the girl's face gleamed before him. The half darkness gave her courage.

"Monsieur," she whispered, "you love me? Yes, I know it. Perhaps I was wrong before—may be God intended—"

She stopped. He was looking at her with eyes that burned, his glance plunged into her very heart like a sword-blade. Yet the wound there was sweet to feel. She neither faltered nor turned away as she spoke further to him.

"I am—for you—if if you will have me. May not one—love, and be for France?"

It had come then. The reward for which he had prayed and longed. The woman whom he loved, loved him! She had avowed it there in the twilight. That blessed end of all his dreams, this happy realization of all his hopes, was at hand! And he could not accept it!

"Louise," he said to her, taking both her hands in his own, "the words you have said, would have made me mad with joy—"

"What!" cried the woman.

"But now—oh, that I had died before this had come upon me!"

"Monsieur, I have offered you myself, a demoiselle of France, the Comtesse de Vaudémont—You hesitate?"

Macartney could not speak. He only bowed his head dumbly before her.

"Monsieur—"

"Wait! Whatever you do, whatever you may think of me, however you may consider me, as you think on this interview in after life—and I am sure you will never forget it—believe only one thing, that I love you, that I would die for you—but—"

"You have refused me! The shame! I shall remember only that!"

She turned and left him, and stepping aft, found herself face to face with Garron, who had just come out of the companion-way. His eyes were filled with jealous hatred. He had heard enough, tip-toeing near, like a thief in the night, to comprehend Macartney's interest in the de Vaudémonts.

"Come with me," he said softly. "Don't shrink, no harm is meant. I want to tell you something."

Dazed and bewildered, overwhelmed with the shock she had sustained, scarcely realizing the situation, Louise found herself in the cabin, in the presence of the captain. By his side was the silent Brébœuf. The marquis emerged from his berth as the two entered. Garron paid no attention to him.

"Woman!" he said roughly, leveling his blunt finger at the girl, "you love that man!"

"How dare—"

"Nonsense!" cried the man furiously. "I was there. I heard! That which I sought, you offered to him."

"Oh!" whispered the marquis softly, under his breath. "For a weapon!"

"He refused—"

The woman stood before him with a body of ice, a heart aflame. If glances could have killed, she had killed him a thousand times. His words brought back to her the shame of her position—that he, the base-born, brutal Garron, should know! Her anger was equally divided between him and Macartney.

"Refused you, Louise! Captain Macartney! What does the man mean?" cried the marquis, coming forward swiftly.

"Silence, Vaudémont! One does not address you. Do you want to know why he would have none of you?" Garron asked again, turning to the woman. "Well, I'll tell you. We had a talk in the cabin this afternoon. He wants to escape. I found out that he loved you, and that you love him. I offered to let him go to-night if he would resign you to me."

"It is a lie!" said the marquis quickly. "A dastardly lie! I know men. I would stake my life on the honor and fidelity of that man!"

"Your life isn't much as a stake, Vaudémont, and besides, you made a mistake before. You were willing to stake your life once on the fidelity of Brébœuf. Now, 'tis I who stake on him. I tell you, arrangements have all been made to let this Englishman go. He gave you up to me."

"'Tis not true, I say! 'Tis not true!" said the marquis again.

He would have given his very soul for a weapon. "My father," said the girl, turning to the old man as if he had indeed been her father, "he refused me—to-night."

"Impossible! Did you—"

"I did nothing, sir. He said that he loved me, and I—I—admitted—"

"Then he would have none of her," interrupted Garron. "But have courage, mademoiselle, there's as good fish in the sea as were ever caught. Look at me! I love you, a blunt sailor, but with a true, loyal heart. Take me!"

There was a tap upon the door of the cabin.

"Who's there?" cried Garron angrily.

"Captain Thouars' compliments, Captain Garron. A signal from the flagship, desiring all the captains to repair on board at once."

"Perdition!" growled Garron. "Just at this juncture when she was almost in my grasp. Have my gig called away, and say that I shall come on deck immediately. You, Vaudémont, and you, woman, remain in the cabin! Brébœuf, guard them well! See that they hold no communication with the Englishman until I return. I shall be back at once. Au revoir."

He swaggered out of the cabin and left the three alone. As he passed by Macartney, standing just where Louise had left him, with his head bent upon his arms upon the rail of the ship, Garron touched him upon the shoulder.

"I am ordered to the flagship the next ahead. I shall return in half an hour. It is my desire that you remain here until I return. The Vaudémont woman charges me to say that she does not wish to have you approach her again."

Macartney nodded his head. There was nothing to say, nothing to do. His honor bound him to this man; his honor had conquered, but had left him broken-hearted. Louise had spurned him in anger and shame. What was the necessity for attempting an explanation, since none could be given. The parting was inevitable. Perhaps some day she would understand.

And still he stared across the rail and dreamed.

Salting the Fountain of Life

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

DURING the Sunday School Convention in Palestine, last April, the writer visited Elisha's Fountain. The following are memoranda of the day's journey: We reached this interesting and historic place about one o'clock to-day, having left Jerusalem in the early morning. We passed Jericho without stopping, riding in carriages about two miles further on. We shall presently return to Jericho. Alighting from our carriages, we crossed a small foot-bridge over the stream which issues from the "fountain." We now find ourselves seated in the small, open bazaar built over the fountain. In the bazaar are displayed curios for sale, such as slings like those used by David, when he was a shepherd, also shepherd's clubs and crooks; and there are Oriental weapons of all sorts, and water-jars of many sizes and shapes. But we are most interested in the fountain itself. It is held in a basin of hewn stone about thirteen yards long and eight yards wide. We taste it, and find it good. "So the waters were healed unto this day."

We have returned to Jericho, and have partaken of lunch. Evidently the water which we had to drink had not been brought from the fountain of Elisha, for it was inhabited by "wiggles," and there was a general demand that it should be brought to us boiling hot, or made into tea. The inhabitants of the present day are evidently less solicitous about pure water than in the days of Elisha, for then the chief men of the city made it their concern and sought a remedy of Elisha. In almost any other locality the fountain would be piped to the city, and not allowed to run waste in a little stream across the fields. We looked for an enterprising water-carrier, who might have brought a goat-skin of it from the fountain to sell in the streets, but none was to be found, nor even a woman with a jar of water upon her head.

Illustration and Application

Surely the very heart of this lesson is in our title, "Salting the Fountain of Life." Life is a flowing river of blessing; childhood is its fountain; religion is the salt, that by purifying the heart in childhood makes the whole life sweet and useful. To these great truths let every teacher hasten, delaying only a few minutes on the Bible history that connects this first lesson of a new quarter with the preceding chapters of the story. Let us gather up the Bible history and its teachings by the ever useful group of questions: Who? When? Where? What? Why?

Who are pictured in the opening of this lesson and when? Elijah, who lived about nine hundred years before Jesus came, is ascending, and Elisha, his successor, is receiving his master's mantle and his spirit, and repeating his miracle in smiting the river to open a way for himself. This was but a transient miracle. He will soon do one of permanent usefulness at a river's fountain. The contrast between these miracles suggests how much more lasting Christian work is likely to be at the fountain of life, in childhood, than if we stop the river of evil in manhood, which usually in such cases soon resumes its wonted way. Where was this fountain healed? Near Jericho. And what do we know of Jericho? It was captured and cursed by Joshua (6: 17-26). The man who rebuilt it paid the penalty in the death of his first-born. The present inhabitants say its latest builder suffered the same penalty. By contrast, we may use this to illustrate how many a man sacrifices the eternal life of his children by making his home in accursed, because wicked, surroundings, that kill the soul, as did Lot when he "pitched his tent at Sodom," and was soon inside, contaminated somewhat himself and his family yet more by an evil environment. The special bane of Jericho when Elisha came, was that the stream on which it depended for water was brackish, probably somewhat like the Dead Sea water a short distance below. It was not only unfit to drink but unfit even to water the land, producing such barrenness as is seen about the Dead Sea to-day. There was little satisfaction in an otherwise "pleasant" city when its water supply was so unwholesome.

What did Elisha do, and why? He went to the very source of the stream, that by purifying that, with God's help, he might purify the whole stream. How little it would have availed to cleanse the water anywhere else! The only way to purify our lives is at the heart-fountain, and the uppermost fountain is best of all, the heart of childhood. "Satisfy us early with thy mercy that we may rejoice and be glad all our days." At the World's Sunday School Convention, in Jerusalem, Dr. Ghosul Howie, in a Conference on Oriental customs, told how new-born infants in Bible lands are "salted" to make the skin dense and firm. The act is also symbolical of the character desired for the child—pure, firm, resolute. If in mature years one shows flabbiness and vacillation, he is likely to hear the taunt, "I see you were not salted." This custom is recognized, and interpreted in the Bible in the words of Ezekiel (16: 4): "As for thy nativity, in the day that thou wast born thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee; thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all." All of which means that the life described was going wrong because it was not started right. We are left in no doubt as to what salt symbolizes. It is again and again used for the preserving, healing grace of God. (Lev. 2: 13; Matt. 5: 13; Col. 4: 6). As salt put on the fresh meat keeps it from spoiling, so religion put into a new life keeps it sweet and useful, when it would otherwise rot and poison us. That salt should be used to cure a fountain already too salt, was probably only to symbolize, as did the brazen serpent, that Christ cures sin by being "made sin for us," that is, by being made "in the likeness of sinners" (N. Y. N. S. R. S. 1: Heb. 2: 14, 16). The salt in the fountain was but a symbol of Christ in the heart of youth, who thus makes all the outgoings of life to rejoice. A kindred illustration is the story of Achilles, whose mother was told he would be invulnerable if dipped in the river Styx, but one spot on his heel by which she held him was not wet, and that was the spot where he was wounded in manhood.

The message of this lesson to the young, is: Let the mind of Christ fully cleanse the heart fountains of your life at its source, that you may be glad and useful ever after. And the lesson also says to the older people: Let your life be a river of blessed helpfulness to all about you. "Everything shall live whithersoever the river runneth." Let us for a little think of mature life as a river, and then go back to its source again. In all ages, poets have pictured a good life as like a river, which puts beauty into the landscape; carries the boats upon its waters with their useful cargoes; turns the wheels of factories on its banks; scatters irrigation on all sides; feeds the ocean, which, in turn, feeds the clouds that return the waters to the earth, to make it "bring forth and

One particular fact that deepened this impression was the non-appearance in market on Mondays of any baskets bearing the favorite mark. Farmer 135 would not pack fruit on Sunday, the dealer said. The housekeeper felt her face when that was said. She had never been so scrupulous. His rectitude represented to her the presence of the saintly Teacher.

If I can live
To make some pale face brighter, and to give
A second lustre to some tear-stained eye,
Or e'en impart
One touch of comfort to an aching heart,
Or cheer some wayworn soul on its passing by!

If I can lend
A strong hand to the fallen, or defend
The weak against a single envious strain,
My life, though brief,
Perhaps, of such that seemeth dear and fair
To us on earth, will not have been in vain.

The purest joy,
Most near to heaven, far from earth's alloy
In breathing comes give way to sun and shine,
And twine well
If on that day of days the angels tell
Of me: "See did her best to do of thine."

HELEN HUNT JACKSON

But now we return to the river's spring, to life's source in childhood. Nothing in all nature, about which scientists come so enthusiastic, is so wonderful as a child. What is a bug or a bird compared to a baby, that is to love and be loved forever! How careful must be that he shall get a bad start! In order to do that we must begin with his grandfather's old hood. O, that we could recognize that we are preparing happiness or sorrow for our children's children by what we are even in our childhood! Some little manner of a child, that is like his father, prompts us to say, "He is a chip of the old block." That is where call heredity. And let us be the "old block" is sound, our characters, our inmost preferences, for the little "chip" that will come from it by and by will have the same quality to start with. We can change it, but we can help save our children by being better ourselves in our very childhood. We can help the baby by example also. He will do what father does and what brother does. "Fair, I step in all your tracks," says a boy walking behind his father in the snow. The father heard and thought how much wider was the meaning than the snow-tracks. The young boys imitate most of all the older brothers with whom they are daily at play. Boys do only what is safe and right for the sake of the little ones about you! We salt the fountain of life by our words. A wonderfully wise old man, that probably influenced a whole life, may have been told in these pages, but in any case, should be repeated here. The lady teacher of this lesson was in Rome, visiting in galleries with an artist. The latter bought from an Italian boy some buns, for which she was to pay what would be three cents in our money, three soldi. She gave the boy two two soldi pieces, and held out her hand for the one soldo he was entitled to as "change," he curled his hand mutely, begging to keep it. She said reproachfully: "Mercante, non mendicare!"—merchant, not mendicant, not mendicant which he proudly raised himself and gave back the soldi. To have given it to him, would have been to give him encouragement in beggary. She gave him instead "the is that are within," an impulse to manly independence, and had salted the fountain of his life.

But it is only by the conversion of children, by the coming of Christ into their hearts, which are by nature "brackish," "brackish" waters, that the fountain and the river of life can be made sweet. Let us close with a "Boy's Hymn," which has been the "cruse," under God's blessing, of salting the fountains of many young lives. It may be sung to the tune of "Woodworth."

"Just as I am," three own to be,
Friend of the young, who lovest me,
To consecrate myself to Thee, O Jesus Christ, I come.

In the glad morning of my day,
My life to give, my vows to pay,
With no reserve and no delay, with all my heart I come.

I would live ever in the light,
I would work ever for the right,
I would serve Thee with all my might, therefore to Thee I come.

"Just as I am," young, strong, and free,
To be the best that I can be
For truth, and righteousness and Thee, Lord of my life, I come.

With many dreams of fame and gold,
Success and joy to make me bold,
But dearer still my faith to hold, for my whole life, I come.

And for Thy sake to win renown,
And then to take my victor's crown,
And at Thy feet to cast it down, O Master, Lord, I come.

THE SPRING KNOWN AS ELISHA'S FOUNTAIN

bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater." It is a great thing to live a life worthy to be compared to such a river. Some lives are only worthy to be called "Dry Creek," like that one so-called in Colorado, that was filled only once, and then to destroy. Look from the Pyramids upon the Nile as a picture of the Christian life. From exhaustless fountains in the Great Nyanza lakes, its long unknown sources, it poured down its ceaseless tide, with enriching annual overflow, until it developed on the very desert, a land of unequalled fertility, which lies like a green fan, spreading in the delta, upon the waste of sand. Its waters, by a wonderful system of irrigation, spread their quickening influence far and wide, like the manifold good influences of word and deed, that go out of a noble life.

Here is the story of a farmer whose life was indeed a river, clear as crystal. A housekeeper, after several complaints to her grocer because unsound fruit had been sent her, was one day offered a basket of peaches and a basket of gem melons, accompanied with this assurance:

"You will not find a single damaged peach or melon in either of these packages. If you do, I will gladly refund the money you pay for them."

She found every peach and melon perfect. The housekeeper reported this on her next visit to the dealer's store, and asked why he was so positive in warranting his goods? "Why, because I have found that the farmer who furnished those baskets never sends dishonest packages to market." The farmer's number, among the commission dealer's consignments, was "135." After that the lady always bought number 135, and the contents of the baskets never failed in measure, condition, or quality. Admiration for the conscientious farmer grew upon the housekeeper, and literally made her more conscientious herself. She felt ashamed whenever she was tempted to slight or "scamp" her work. Number 135 seemed to be looking at her.

IN THE SHADE OF THE VINE

BY MARGARET E SANGSTER

Women and Temperance

NO single feature in the unfortunate affair which has brought so much censure upon Bishop Potter, is as repulsive as that which provides a drinking-place for women. In London and Liverpool, the sight of a woman the worse for gin and rum is not so uncommon as in New York, where it is a dismayed surprise. Somehow, a woman in gin and a woman in a saloon, though only in the entrance-hall, appals us far more than does the sight of a man reeling home to sleep off a clutch.

When the mother in any home, be it a palace of wealth and refinement, or of poverty and coarseness, takes to drink, farewell to hope and happiness for all beneath her sway.

The fancy, thinking of the matter superficially, that no women are ever intemperate except very ignorant and very poor women. Yet fashionable drinking is so truly on the increase, in New York at least, that any day, women may be seen drinking wine or beer served with their meals in public restaurants, a thing unheard of, and in the dizzy whirl of pre-class excitement, women resort to stimulants that they may keep the pace, the same result follows that follows when men drift into excesses.

Cases, politely labelled nervous prostration, are handled by physicians and nurses, who understand full well the disease is alcoholism in one of its stressing phases. A gentle, refined, elegant woman, caught in the toils of intemperance, is as profane, as quarrelsome, and as indelicate as any illiterate woman who earns her living by daily labour takes her first downward step when she drinks to relieve hunger and fatigue. When it comes to the fatal yield to inebriety, it is with all women, as the saying puts it strongly:

The colonel's lady,
And Judy O'Grady,
Are sisters, under their skins.

One of the saloons on the East Side, the West, or along the wharves, or on street corners, have what is called a "family entrance." Here children go, young girls, and women with shawls over their heads, carrying tin pails, and cups, and pitchers, to bring home the evening beer. This "family entrance" has always seemed cruelly ironical, for the very woman who enters there are very sure to be depending what was formerly aptly called "the fool's pence."

When drink becomes master in a home, peace and peace fly the place. The devil himself leans grinning from the open door of every saloon, and strides as Apollyon full across the pathway of man, woman, or child, who dares to unite, by ever slender and tenuous a cord, the saloon to the home.

The Family Caterer

Whoever undertakes the business of arranging the family bill of fare, should take pains to have variety. The great trouble of the family caterer is that very often she must think what to put on the table that will tempt reluctant appetite on the part of those who surround it. People who work out of doors, and who obtain food, and bring to it ravenous appetites, do not in the simplest fare may be, but those who need to be seduced by delicate viands must have greater consideration. One of the duties incumbent on the person who supplies the family table, is to think of the tastes of the different members of the group, and so arrange the daily menu that each shall have something that he or she enjoys.

Fortune is the deadly foe of pleasure at the table. The day which three times a day the circle gathers, should be a place of pleasure. One reason why grown-up people so often in memory to the tables of their boyhood, and the cooking of their mothers, is because they brought to the table the boy's appetite, and the boy's enjoyment. Yet we must admit that in days when the women of the house personally did the cooking, as they do not now, and when it was regarded as worth while to take pains, better food was served on the ordinary table than can be possible where the caterer thinks that anything will do.

"My husband is a perfect martyr to dyspepsia," said a lady the other day,

"What do you give him to eat?" was asked, and the reply was, "Oh, anything that is easiest to prepare. Usually I can buy things at the delicatessen shop, and bread and pies at the baker's. Living as we do, it is too much trouble to fuss about cooking."

Comment is unnecessary. The husband's indigestion was

Domestic Service in Russia

ALTHOUGH slavery no longer exists in the Czar's dominions, caste lines are almost as rigid and unbending as in India, and domestic servants are anything but free in reality. Engagements are made for a year. No servant will step so much as a hair's breadth out of his or her particular niche, in which, be it noticed, the responsibility for good work is strictly maintained. The footman never deigns to assist the butler. The lady's maid does not condescend to help the waitress or chambermaid. The laundress will not scrub a floor, nor will the charwoman wring a piece or draw a bucket of water for the laundress. The cook sticks to skillet and kneading bowl. If any one of the twenty to fifty employees in a great Russian household fails to do the work required, a report is at once made to the police, and an entry of this is inscribed in the records kept for the purpose. Middle class families keep from three to six servants. Servants with bad marks against them cannot obtain employment easily, as employers refer to the police records before making contracts.

At Easter every servant receives a present. Wages vary. A chef may receive a sum amounting from one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars a year, but the usual maid-of-all work receives but twenty-five dollars for a twelve months' work, while sixty is a fair average sum.

The Fall Sewing

Only yesterday we got the spring sewing out of the way and here we are with the fall sewing staring us in the face.

"That child has outgrown every one of her last winter's frocks! They will have to be let down," exclaims the mother, surveying her daughter's inches with a rueful face. Yet, fancy how dreadful it would be if "that child" at seven, had stopped growing for a whole year.

The truth is, the little people grow apace, and the proud mothers must sew for them. Why not be satisfied not to elaborate too much? Simplicity is the most beautiful quality in a child's dress, and winter clothes especially require very little in the way of superfluous trimming.

The thrifty woman, be it noted, is not the one who spends most time and energy in the lovely days of September and October, in sitting still and stitching. A truer economy will tend to make her lay up a good and plentiful amount of vitality, by staying out of doors, and deferring some of her work until rainy days come.

The Release of Mrs. Maybrick

When I read that at last the gates of her prison had been opened, and that Florence Ethel Maybrick had been set free, I thanked God. As Florence Chandler, a young girl of singular beauty, gayety and sweetness, this most unfortunate of women attended a famous school for young ladies in Brooklyn, N. Y. She was the daughter of a distinguished Southern family, with old traditions of the best our country has to bestow. When but eighteen, she was married in England to a man many years her senior, and one with whom she spent a most unhappy life. Convicted of his murder on circumstantial evidence of the flimsiest character, and tried before a judge who was soon afterward confined in a madhouse where he died, Mrs. Maybrick never had a fair chance to prove her innocence of the infamous charge against her. She was sentenced to death, and the sentence was changed to imprisonment for life. Fifteen years she has spent in prison. During this period her mother has never once intermitted incessant and strenuous efforts for her release and pardon. Prominent men and women on both sides of the ocean toiled for years in her behalf, sometimes injudiciously. The late gifted Gail Hamilton, sister-in-law of the late James G. Blaine, wrote open letters to Queen Victoria and Mr. Gladstone, beseeching their aid, and monster petitions were sent to the Home Office, that this poor long-suffering American woman might be set free. The world moves after all.

the direct result of the poor food served to save trouble. So far as economy is concerned, the amount to be paid to the doctor would soon counterbalance any saving in the case.

A lady was the other day pluming herself on the way in which she had secured handsome silk dresses for herself and her daughter. She said: "I saved those gowns from the table. I find that John and the children can get along just as well without beefsteak and mutton chops as with them, and I manage to get Dora's and my things out of the amount I cut off from the butcher and grocer." This, too, is a mistake on the part of the family caterer, who would better provide good food even if the wardrobe is plainer, and the family make a less brave show before the world. Strong minds need strong bodies to live in, and to do the world's work well we must have good food, and enough of it.

The Heart of the Adirondacks

By MARY BARTON COOKMAN

THE lover of nature and the mountain wanderer can find few better regions for enjoyment than among the Adirondack Mountains. There are many lovely lakes lying at the foot of these rugged hills. The shores of the lakes are being rapidly occupied with fine camps, and many of the visitors own steam launches. Nothing can be more delightful than a sail in one of these pleasure boats, as they afford a fine opportunity to see the landscape, enriched by the mysterious play of the clouds upon the mountains. Shadow and sunshine follow each other, a type of human life. Here, among the hills, one can gain new powers and health. The gorgeous sun, tints with its departing rays every mountain peak, and one feels that God has painted the sky as no artist could have done. Ruskin says, "No artist can reach his ideal, even in painting a tree, unless he is in sympathy with nature, and the very life of the tree seems to flow into his body, as well as through his brain." In this hill country, the spirit expands in delight and searches for the source of all this radiant beauty. Peace reigns, and one chants:

"LONG LAKE," IN THE MIDST OF THE ADIRONDACKS

All glory be to God on high,
And on the earth be peace,
Good will henceforth from heaven to men,
Begin and never cease.

Immortality seems real, the Spirit feels in companionship with nature and God and rejoices in it. There are several entrances into the heart of the Adirondacks. One of these is through Fulton Chain of eight lakes. Leaving the train in the early morning, we find ourselves in the lake country. These lakes were named in honor of Robert Fulton, inventor of steamboats. They vary in size and shape, but are all of surpassing beauty. A sail through them can never be forgotten. From Fulton Chain, we go into Clear Water Lake; then, by a short railway, to Raquette Lake, where the traveler is allowed half an hour for breakfast. At this place we embark on a small steamboat, which carries us through some of the most picturesque scenery in the wilderness. Raquette Lake is one of the largest, and one of the highest in elevation above the tide, being 1,774 feet. It is twelve miles long and three miles wide. The little steamboat is not very rapid, as it requires two hours to traverse the lake. The change from a long night's travel in a sleeping car to these lovely lakes is full of enjoyment. Here is the stillness of nature, with no voice to disturb the thought, and the air is full of life. The whispering winds, the twittering of the birds along the shores of these leafy groves, remind us that we are nearer the heart of things, and the rest of spirit comes to us. We reach at the end lake what is called "a carry," which means that a short open car is to convey us to the next lake, which is Blue Mountain. The lake takes its name from Blue Mountain, a majestic dome, called by the Indians "The Hill of Storms," and which rises from the shores to a height of nearly four thousand feet above tide. Another steamboat meets us, and we glide under the shadow of these mountains. Reaching the end of the lake, we find a stage waiting to take us to Long Lake, twelve miles over a rough road but through a magnificent forest of trees. Part of the way is beside the shores of Long Lake, which is dotted with many beautiful islands. We reach the "Sagamore" Hotel about noon. It is situated on the edge of Long Lake, and in the outskirts of the village where lives Mitchell Sabattis, the only Indian in the Adirondack region, and whose father, Captain Peter, assisted in conducting Benedict Arnold and his army from the Kennebec to the Chaudiere, in 1775, to attack Quebec. At Long Lake, a private steam launch carries us eight miles down the lake to a luxurious some distance on the trails of these private preserves, to find the best mountain trout. Guides are necessary, who know the path through the woods. They carry in hampers the food necessary for the party, also fishing lines and bait, with some cooking utensils. These trackless forests seem lonely, and at thought of being lost, one turns to their faithful guide with fresh interest. After tramping over fallen trees and through bogs we come to where a camp has been built for shelter. It is made of rude logs, but water-tight boats await us on the lake, and with fishing line, the business of "still" fishing is begun. Not a word must be spoken, and quick catching and landing of your trout makes the accomplished fisherman. Night comes on, and the work of the day serves for a meal in the evening, and then a bed of balsam boughs for tired bodies but rested brain. Two or three days are spent in a trip from Long Lake to Saranac Lake, or to Paul Smith's or Lake Placid.

The mountains, peak on peak, rise on every side, Owl's Head, Buck Mountain and the Ampersand in the distance. We start early in the morning for one of these excursions. The trusty guides row rapidly down the lake to a river, which seems so tranquil, and where, running close to the shore, we can put out our hands and gather mountain flowers and water lilies. Coming to a landing, the guides carry the boats on their heads to the next lake, while the party trudges on foot. A stop is made at a wilderness inn for dinner, and the quaint surroundings only add charm to the trip. With a fine appetite, one enjoys the repast, and does not envy a prince. After a short rest, the pleasant trip is resumed, and after passing through several small lakes, and another short carry, Upper Saranac Lake (called by the Indians "Lake of the Silver Sky") is reached. This lake has probably the greatest number of wealthy summer residents upon its shores. It is surrounded by mountain peaks. On a clear day, from the summit of White Fall Mountain, can be seen the waters of Lake Champlain, the Green Mountains, the St. Lawrence River, Lake Ontario, Lower Saranac Lake or "The Lake of the Clustered Stars." A climb up any of these high mountains to see the sunrise or sunset, will repay the lover of nature. We are told that the women of Greece went out to the sunrise, and singing to the sun, prayed that their hearts might be satisfied; but we, who live in a Christian age, have clearer insight, a deeper knowledge, a more reverent idea of life. All worship must lead to Christ, the Sun of Righteousness. With God in the heart, every hill-top and valley becomes an altar. He alone can subdue the unrest of nations and the unsatisfied heart. When He reigns, peace like a dove will brood over this world. These memories of the "Heart of the Adirondacks," are recorded, in the hope of making others partakers of glimpses of God's beautiful world of nature.

WHAT'S THE USE

To Keep a "Coffee Complexion"

A lady says: "Postum has helped my complexion so much that my friends say I am growing young again. My complexion used to be coffee colored, muddy and yellow, but now it is clear and rosy as when I was a girl. I was induced to try Postum by a friend who had suffered just as I had suffered from indigestion, palpitation of the heart and sinking spells."

"After I had used Postum a week I felt much better than I was afraid it would be. But now two years have passed and I am a well woman. I owe it all to Postum coffee and drinking Postum in its place. I had drunk coffee all my life. I had heard that it was the cause of my troubles, but was not until I actually quit coffee and tried Postum that I became certain that all my troubles ceased and I am now strong again." THE RETREAT OF THE RUSSIAN ARMY

ACCORDING to the reckoning of Japanese military experts, the second stage of the great war drama in Manchuria has now been reached. After the defeat of the Russians at Liao-Yang (described in last week's issue), Gen. Kouropatkin, seeing his northern line of communications threat-stricken. Never did it become a straggling mass. Strung out over a length of fully fifteen miles, stripped of many of its guns and wagons, and with its men all worn and weak with long fighting, it marched on doggedly, confident that the genius of its commander would pull it through. Up to September 8, it was estimated that a grand total of 70,000 men had been killed or wounded since the first onset at Liao-Yang, the Japanese losses probably being more than half.

So skilfully did Gen. Kouropatkin conduct the retreat, and so stoutly did his troops resist the Japanese assaults, that it seemed probable that the strategic point—the narrow defile at Tieh-ling, north of Moukden—would be reached on time, and the Japanese checked and the railroad saved.

Moukden, where Kouropatkin's main army temporarily halted, while his advance guard continued northward, is now filled with wounded, who are being forwarded to Harbin, at the rate of eighty car-loads per day. At Harbin, hospital accommodations have been prepared for 40,000 wounded.

On Wednesday, Sept. 7, while Kouropatkin's rear-guard was still fighting its way many miles south of Moukden, the Russian troops in that city were attacked by Kuroki's forces. At this juncture the plight of the Russians was more desperate ened, decided to retire upon Moukden, which he reached on September 8, with the main body of the army, after a continuous series of encounters with the pursuing Japanese. For a time it looked as though the command of Gen. Stachelberg, which composed the Russian rear-guard, would be surrounded and cut off, and it was only by the most desperate fighting that it reached a point of comparative safety. The course of the retreat was along the Mandarin road, one of the oldest highways in Manchuria, which had become a succession of mud-puddles owing to the heavy rains. Progress was slow; cannon and horses were mired, and much of the baggage had to be abandoned in the fight. On leaving Liao-Yang precipitately, the Russians abandoned great quantities of stores, ammunition, guns, rifles and wagons, and these, together with hundreds of other wagons left on the Mandarin highway, fell into the hands of the Japanese. Most of the guns were in serviceable condition. Another version of the evacuation says that the Russians succeeded in removing or destroying all the stores and ammunition, and that the Japanese only found four guns and two locomotives in the abandoned city.

That Liao-Yang was one of the world's greatest battles in point of numbers, is undisputed; but it was indecisive. Kuroki's flank movement, upon the success of which so much depended, failed to accomplish its principal object, viz: the cutting off of the Russian northerly line of retreat, although it compelled the evacuation of Liao-Yang after a struggle in which superb bravery was displayed on both sides. When the Japanese entered, they found trenches, shelters and paths filled with dead, while the hillsides were strewn with bodies, both Japanese and Russian, and dotted with clothing, rifles, and ammunition. After the evacuation, there began a series of attacks on Kouropatkin's retreating columns, which vividly recall the descriptions of the famous military retreats of former times, and especially that of the French from Moscow. Although defeated, the Czar's great army was not panic-than at any time since the retreat began. It was known that a considerable force of Japanese was threatening Tieh-ling, and if Kuroki could succeed in that quarter, by combining with the Japanese column which had been marching parallel with the railroad on the west, the whole Russian army would be imperiled. The St. Petersburg War Office officials, however, believe that the Japanese are "too much exhausted to seriously threaten the line of retreat," and that for the present, the most serious difficulty Kouropatkin has to face is the condition of the roads. Kuroki and Kouropatkin have been marching northward along parallel lines, the Japanese in a rough region and the Russians along a flat country, but embarrassed by the high Chinese corn, which prevented marching on the side of the main roads.

No official news has yet come from Tokio regarding the Liao-Yang fight, Japan's capital, however, is celebrating the victory, and the Mikado has issued an address congratulating the army on its success. It is believed in Tokio that the Russians will not stop short of Harbin.

NEW UNDERWEAR IDEA.

People May Now Wear Dollar Garments for Fifty Cents.

The readiness of the people of the United States to welcome a new idea has found fresh illustration in the reception accorded the new style of underwear which is having such an unusual sale. It is called Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece Underwear. This underwear has the peculiarity that its name implies, combining an elastic rib on one side with a soft fleece on the other. The fleece absorbs the heat, while the rib, yielding to every motion, allows it to escape slowly, thus affording protection against chills and colds. The laundry test has never failed to prove Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece a durable and unshrinking fabric. The women's garments are tastefully made, of full length and close-fitting. The men's garments are equal in every respect to the women's. Both are fifty cents a garment. The children's garments—pants, vests and union suits—are models of sense. All sizes are twenty-five cents the separate garment, fifty cents the union suit. The trademark, Vellastic Utica Ribbed Fleece, is sewed on every garment.

THE DOCTOR'S WIFE

Agrees With Him About Food.

A trained nurse says: "In the practice of my profession I have found so many points in favor of Grape-Nuts food that I unhesitatingly recommend it to all my patients."

"It is delicate and pleasing to the palate (an essential in food for the sick) and can be adapted to all ages, being softened with milk or cream for babies or the aged when deficiency of teeth renders mastication impossible. For fever patients or those on liquid diet I find 'Grape Nuts and albumen water' very nourishing and refreshing." This recipe is my own idea and is made as follows: Soak a teaspoonful of Grape-Nuts in a glass of water for an hour, strain and serve with the beaten white of an egg and a spoonful of fruit juice for flavoring. This affords a great deal of nourishment that even the weakest stomach can assimilate without any distress.

"My husband is a physician and he uses Grape-Nuts himself and orders it many times for his patients."

"Personally I regard a dish of Grape-Nuts with fresh or stewed fruit as the ideal breakfast for anyone—well or sick." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

In any case of stomach trouble, nervous prostration or brain fog, a 10 days trial of Grape-Nuts will work wonders toward nourishing and rebuilding, and in this way ending the trouble. "There's a reason" and trial proves.

Gala Day at Mont-Lawn

TWO hundred and forty-seven pairs of bright and eager eyes, are scanning the bit of road showing through the arches of trees, as it winds its way up the hillside to Mont-Lawn. The children are gathered in groups here and there, busy at their play, chattering and laughing in their delight. Some, walking up and down the gravel paths, some swinging and utilizing other methods for working off their childish exuberance found in the open air "gym," while others are grouped about a teacher, and still others are running about the nearby grassy fields, with the little forms darting hither and thither, clothed in thin, gayly-colored print dresses. But not many minutes elapse between visits to the spot where the bit of road can be seen, for this is a special occasion for Mont-Lawn; it is Saturday, and not only is Dr. Klopsch, the man with the "father-heart," whom all the children love, to come for his weekly visit, but a large party from the publishing and press-rooms of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are expected, and the little ones are on tip-toe of alertness, for it is a strange specimen of childhood to whom the word "party" does not carry suggestions of good times and good things.

By and by a soprano shout goes up. "Here they come," cry the children, as the loaded stages slowly wind up the hill. Then further watching and waiting for another glimpse, a little further on, then a concerted rush down toward Mont-Lawn's entrance, as the stages drive up. Such a welcome as greets them, such cheers, such shouts, such a polyglot of delighted expressions from two hundred and forty-seven little voices. Careless of horses' hoofs or carriage wheels, the children dance and skip about until they see their beloved Dr. Klopsch, then, like bees they swarm about the stage, clambering upon the steps, shouting in glee, hanging on wherever they can get a hold, some dropping off to make room for others, until, in triumphal, but very disorganized procession, stages, passengers and children, congregate at the entrance of the Main House.

Here Superintendent Collins and her staff bid the visitors welcome, and at stroke of gong all the little folks draw up in line, while they listen to a few words from the Doctor, who was fairly besieged as he concluded, and started to walk over to one of the other cottages. As he slowly moved along the walk, eager little hands grasped his arms and hands, the children ran before, behind, and on either side, a sweet, innocent "charge of the Light Brigade," and in their midst moved a happy, smiling man, with dark eyes alight, the love of little children shining forth and irradiating his whole countenance.

Where now is the burden of business cares, necessary to the development of this great work for children, which is only one of the many plans inaugurated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the benefit of the poor and helpless—slipped off and forgotten in the joy of this holiday with the children. "Are we going to have the bean game?" "Can we have the races?" These and a hundred other questions are answered, while other groups press closer, and still others surround them, until every child on the place seems in evidence. After dinner has been served and eaten with a relish in the dining tent, the children are persuaded that they must scatter about the grounds, while the guests are in turn invited to a plentiful and delicious meal. Many of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD employees had never visited Mont-Lawn before, but through the courtesy of the proprietor, a large number of the force now saw for the first time this beautiful Home, exquisite in every detail, from the grandeur of its setting, with the background of Rockland hills rising in protecting green, to the minutest item of home life, enjoyed by the thousands of children who have partaken of Mont-

Lawn's hospitality since its establishment.

"I always knew this was a beautiful place, and a grand work," said one visitor. "but I never realized how lovely the site, nor how important the work, until now. It is one thing to read about Mont-Lawn, and quite another to see it, feel it, and know it. I shall never forget this day as long as I live," and her sentiments were echoed by every one of the group she was addressing.

"And how much has been accomplished," said another, "since my last visit, four years ago; how many improvements have been made, all combining in such a grand whole for the uplift of the coming generation. The little children can never entirely forget what they see and hear at this Home; they must carry away enough good to influence them through all their future lives."

All through the delightful day children and adults were alike happy, and after the games on the lawn and singing exercises in the chapel were over, and the stages appeared to convey the guests away, everyone left with the regret that their visit could not be longer.

The departing guests were "sped" by hearty cheers from the children and pleasant good-byes from the staff of workers. A pleasant journey to the city ended a day long to be remembered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD employees, and never-to-be-forgotten by the writer, who was ONE OF THEM.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD acknowledges, with much gratitude, a contribution of One Thousand Dollars for the Children's Home Fund, by Miss C. L. D., of New York City. The children will rise up and call her blessed, indeed.

HIS GREATER TASK

Written after a visit to our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. See Mark 10: 16: "He put His hands upon them, and blessed them."

HE spake, and worlds began their march—
A task so small for His Almighty power,
His word could do it.

But when He would his greater task perform—Childhood to bless—

His utmost reach of power was only fit.
He took them to His heart to bless.
Can we, whose life is joined to theirs, do less?

UNION PACIFIC OVERLAND ROUTE

A Typical Chinese Christian

In a letter dated at Ing Hok, Tung Guok, China—(Everlasting Happiness, Middle Kingdom), Rev. Edward H. Smith, missionary of Foochow, writes:

"Not long ago, we received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a check to help in our work. Such gifts help the heathen, who, through your generosity, receive the Gospel and are taken out of heathenism, and leave off killing their little girls, abusing their wives, worshipping their idols, smoking opium, and doing all manner of sin that abounds in dark China. These are the things we see out here, and it makes our hearts glad to see the great changes that are going on in old China.

"We must train up the boys and girls who are to be leaders of their people. Here is one of our native pastors, Pastor Ling is my right-hand man. On his judgment and on his Christian character I lean without fear. He is the counselor of the churches, the helper of those in trouble and the friend and teacher of the highest families in the district city of Ing Hok. He is a mighty power for good in the whole of our Chinese country, which is as large as Connecticut.

"In the photograph there are also his wife and six children, four boys and two girls. This picture was taken the morning that the oldest son started to go to school, for there is no boarding-school in all our beautiful mountainous State, and he had to be sent a two days' journey down the river in a boat to Foochow, where he is now studying English and 'western learning' in our American Board Foochow College.

"Now, there are hundreds of such bright native boys whom we must train to be Christian teachers, preachers, statesmen, business men. We have land, and $600 already sent to us by the good friends in America to build our Ing Hok boys' boarding-school. Now if only you who read this have faith to see the great future that is before China, then you will want to have a share in planting this Christian academy on the hill at Ing Hok."

Boston churches will be devoted to the Peace cause. In the afternoon, large special meetings will be held at Tremont Temple and elsewhere. On Monday noon, at Tremont Temple, the Congress will be welcomed by the Mayor of Boston, the Governor of Massachusetts, and a representative of the National Government. Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State, hopes to be present for this office. The deliberate meetings of the Congress will be held at Tremont Temple every forenoon during the week. In the evenings there will be public meetings at Tremont Temple, Park Street Church, the Old South Meeting House, and Faneuil Hall, devoted to the various aspects of the Peace and Arbitration cause. One meeting will be devoted to the Work and Influence of the Hague Tribunal (Hon. Andrew D. White presiding), another to the Reduction of National Armaments, another to Education, another to the Mutual Relations of Races, and others to the special interests of women (Mrs. May W. Sewall presiding), of Workingmen (Samuel Gompers presiding), and of Businessmen. A reception for the delegates will be given by the Mayor of Boston. On Friday evening there will be a festival and dinner, with speeches. The afternoons will be devoted to social entertainments and excursions.

is the title of a book which tells how to invest small sums ($10 or more per month), how to tell a good investment, how you might have converted $100 into $358.83, how to choose between real estate and stocks, how savings banks make their money, how to choose your partners, how to guard against uncertain "prospects," how to protect yourself in case you should not care to hold an investment indefinitely, etc. This book is not an advertisement of any particular investment. It is a general "talk" about investments, based upon my experiences and observations. Write me a postal saying, simply, "Send How Money Grows." You will receive the book, free, by return mail.

We want everyone who has rheumatism to send us his or her name. We will send by return mail a pair of Magic Foot Drafts, the wonderful external remedy which has brought more comfort into the United States than any internal remedy ever made. If they give relief, send us One Dollar; if not don't send us a cent.

Magic Foot Drafts are worn on the soles of the feet and relieve by absorbing the poisonous acids in the blood through the large pores. They relieve rheumatism in every part of the body. It must be evident to you that we couldn't afford to send the drafts on approval if they didn't relieve. Write to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Co., RA24 Oliver Bldg., Jackson, Mich., for a trial pair of drafts on approval. We send also a valuable booklet on Rheumatism.

SELF-ABNEGATION

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

It is a mark of how really Elijah learned his lesson on Mount Horeb that he who had said, "I, even I only, remain a prophet of the Lord" (I. Kings 18: 22), should have been so ready to anoint another to fill his place. John the Baptist said of the Lord Jesus: "He must increase, but I must decrease" (John 3: 30). Paul learned that he was the chief only of sinners; and our Lord taught that it is the first lesson of an apostle to pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth [other] laborers into his harvest (Matt. 9: 37; 10: 1; Luke 10: 1, 2).

John the Baptist never announced himself, but his Master. Christ did not come to proclaim himself by making his voice heard in the streets; the Spirit of God does not testify of himself, but of Christ, and all that is of Christ within one shrinks from what seems very like boasting in some people, when they lightly, almost flippantly, will run through their experiences something like this: "I was converted at such a time, and wholly sanctified at such a time, and baptized with the Holy Ghost at such a time, and anointed for service at such a time, etc., etc. Some way one feels that the Holy, Holy, Holy God does not desire such recommendations, and that the broken and contrite heart, broken by the view of what it cost to redeem our souls, and the spirit failing before him, brings God much nearer to needy souls than this kind of testimony. Oh, what is needed is lives which savor of Christ, which bring him wherever they are seen; such as fear to grieve him, and are ever on the watch to know and to do his will. Elisha was such an one. "This is a holy man of God which passeth by us continually," said the Shunammite to her husband (II. Kings 4: 9).

Elijah was a man called by God to utter and to execute judgment for sin. Elisha, called equally by God, and clothed with a double portion of the same spirit, was a man of mercy. After the sons of the prophets in their unbelief that Elijah had been translated, had with fifty men sought three days for him, they returned to Jericho, and complained to Elisha of the bad quality of the water and the barrenness of the land—probably the result of the bad water; and Elisha said, "Bring me a cruse, and put salt therein. And they brought it to him. And he went forth unto the spring of waters, and cast the salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land." And the waters were healed. Thus Elisha began his separate ministry as God's messenger and instrument of blessing. There was no self-assertion in him, no saying, "I am a prophet of the Lord." It was the Lord who healed the waters.

And Elisha went from thence to Mount Carmel. We are not told the purpose of this journey, right across the land in a northwesterly direction over sixty miles. But when we remember what took place when, on that same mountain, the fire of God had fallen, and all Israel shouted, "The Lord, he is the God; the Lord, he is the God," one can well believe that the object of the prophet was to seek, alone with God, to enter into his thoughts for the full conquest of Baal-worship, against which, through Elijah, he had struck such a blow. Not less than that man of whirlwind, earthquake, and fire, was the whole soul of Elisha intent on the deliverance of his people from their bondage to idolatry. But God effects his purposes by different means and different instruments. One Christian worker can never do the exact work or fill the exact place of another; only God knows whom to use and how and when to use, those who place themselves at his disposal.

Filling Vacant Places*

GLADLY would we keep the leaders and teachers with us, but one after another passes away. Even the prophets did not live beyond their allotted span. Men who are sorely needed for the betterment of the world, who have done a noble work and seem capable of doing still more and better things, answer death's summons and leave their places vacant. Who is to fill them? Frequently the man called to the duty feels himself inadequate. The bereaved people perceive that he lacks the genius and the experience of his predecessor, but thankfully accept the best service he is able to render. It is seldom that the place is exactly filled, and it is sometimes well that it should not be. It is not imitators that are needed, but men retaining their own individuality, while being filled with the same spirit. Every man has his own way of working and methods which suit his special gifts. To change them for others that have been practised by a predecessor would often be unwise, even though the latter may have been successful in his hands. The prime need for the man who is called to follow a great leader is, that he be animated by the same motives, that he seek the same end, and have the same devotion to service. If he have those, he need not be concerned about following in his predecessor's steps. It may be that the old methods have served their purpose and a new departure will be beneficial. Or the situation and the environment have changed and a new way of proceeding is required. Moses having done his work that was necessary in his time is succeeded by Joshua, who is of a very different order. The lawgiver was needed in his day, but on entering the enemy's country the soldier's genius is required. So the work goes forward, and the ever-changing need demands a new kind of leader. The unchangeable requisites are obedience to God and consecration to duty.

The Sacred Writings*

BETTER advice than that the Apostle Paul gave to the young pastor, in the passage associated with the Topic, it would be impossible to conceive. There is a tendency to misuse the Bible by making it a fetish, that is almost as injurious as the tendency to disregard its teaching. The absurd literalism which places emphasis on injunctions, clearly temporary, and demands obedience to them; that discusses words and phrases of incidental importance, and draws inferences from the mere setting of a Parable or a prophecy—is among the vain babblings that the Apostle condemns. It is not long since a European preacher delivered a series of sermons to show the spiritual meaning of the setting of the Tabernacle in the wilderness, and drew lessons from the shape of the pillars and the texture of the curtains. How many sermons and arguments have been devoted to Melchizedek! How many to the nature of angels! How many to the origin of evil! Wasted time and effort are these, when the world needs the Gospel, and men are yearning to learn how to avoid sin, and how to live Christian lives. There are people who, being in perplexity about a duty, open their Bibles and take the first passage that meets their eye, as a direction. The course is silly and puerile. Not so did God intend his Word to be used. It was written for people in varied circumstances, and its teaching was given to people who needed that particular teaching at that particular time, but such teaching was not applicable to all people at all times. The people to whom Paul wrote, needed to be taught that faith was the essence of religion, while the people to whom James wrote, needed to be reminded of their practical duties. Both efforts were necessary, and they were consistent with one another, but through not recognizing the facts, how much dispute has been caused! The Bible should be read with intelligence as well as with reverence, otherwise mischief ensues.

WARD'S CATALOGUE is the POPULAR ONE everywhere, and is preferred by almost everybody to all others. We expect thousands of applications as soon as this announcement is read, so we urge you to get your application in early.

It's the Only Complete Catalogue Published

The only one that is absolutely up to date and complete in every detail, the only one that quotes nothing but perfectly dependable goods at prices the lowest obtainable anywhere. Catalogue No. 73 is all that a good catalogue should be. It represents the largest stock of goods in the world—21 different divisions, each a store in itself, 85 separate and distinct lines open for your examination. Practically everything we have to sell is included; no sending for special catalogues after you receive the big one. Everything in Catalogue No. 73 this year—an improvement we know will be hailed with delight by our thousands of friends and old customers.

Edition de Luxe

Nothing like it ever before attempted. Printed on heavy white book paper, making it strong and durable, rich in appearance, easy to read, and more desirable in every respect. The Edition de Luxe is a triumph in catalogue making. It contains over 30,000 illustrations, most of which are new and print perfectly on the fine white paper used for the Edition de Luxe; 5,000 quotations of high-grade, absolutely honest merchandise, set in new type cast especially for this catalogue; 12 pages of carpets, rugs and portieres printed in actual colors; 2 pages of men's neckties in actual colors; about 200 pages of satin finished paper showing actual photographic reproductions of laces, embroideries, millinery, woman's fashions, furs, etc. This catalogue weighs over 6½ lbs. and is 3 inches thick. When we tell you that other catalogues don't weigh over 3 lbs. you will quickly see what an enormous book Catalogue No. 73 is. Experts pronounce it the finest specimen of a catalogue ever produced.

For the Men

The largest stock of hardware in the world is at your command, everything for your home, your barn, your farm, your ranch. No matter what your occupation is, we have what you need—your clothing, your shoes, farm implements, vehicles, harness, photo and electrical goods, books, watches, etc. Everything from windmills to fish hooks—all at prices so low that you can save anywhere from 15 to 50 per cent by trading with us.

For the Women

The very latest styles in women's wear, furniture, notions, groceries, glassware, toilet articles, stationery, sewing machines, books, jewelry, carpets, curtains, and 10,000 other good and necessary articles. Particular care has been given to our fashions in women's wearing apparel. Our buyers have picked up the best of everything shown in New York and other Eastern markets. Our styles are correct and the very latest—later than those shown in any other general catalogue. Don't buy from an old catalogue with last year's styles. Catalogues of other firms issued ahead of ours contain last year's fashions, and are not trustworthy. We know this to be a fact, because this year's styles were not shown by the New York designers until August 1, and we have delayed the publication of Catalogue No. 73 until our buyers returned from New York with the new samples for next winter.

It is our policy to lead the procession, and you can positively rely upon our catalogue. Among other things of interest to women in Catalogue No. 73 is the largest retail stock of dry goods in the world. Choice silks, dainty linens, fashionable dress goods, sheeting, towelings, cotton goods, etc.; in fact everything a wide-awake dry-goods store should have—all of the best quality and very reasonable in price. With Catalogue No. 73 in your hands you can, at your leisure, select everything for your home, for yourself, for your family, without the trouble of a shopping trip, and with the absolute certainty that everything will be just a little bit better than you expect.

For Everybody

Catalogue No. 73 will be found a source of great convenience and economy. Regardless of your age, your occupation, or your wealth, it enables you to select exactly what you want without the annoyance of visiting a dozen stores and taking what they have to offer, whether it is just what you want or not.

We Do Not Sell Trash

Nothing but the best is good enough for our customers. Many firms are making a noise about their low prices; but don't be misled. A low price is no bargain unless you get quality. Anybody can sell worthless goods cheap.

Peru Through American Eyes

Social Aspects in the Southern Republic---President Candamo and the Bible

IN Peru, all questions were thrown in the background this month by the recent death of President Candamo, in Arequipa, whither he had gone to recruit his health. This sad event cast a cloud over the country. The nation, which was looking forward to a period of progress under his capable administration, unitedly mourned his loss.

President Candamo was neither a political intriguer nor a military dictator, but a private citizen, representative of the best interests of the country. Before his election, he was President of the Chamber of Commerce of Lima. A tremendous outburst of patriotic feeling took place when he assumed the Presidential chair. Rarely has Peru been more proud of her President, and "Viva, Candamo," "Long live Candamo," was on every lip.

Protestant workers in Peru are indebted to Senor Candamo for services rendered to the cause of civil and religious liberty. When a consignment of Bibles, belonging to the American Bible Society, was locked up in the Customs House, through the influence of priestly intolerance, Senor Candamo, as president of the Provisional Government in Lima, issued a decree liberating the Bibles. This decree, which he kindly allowed to go before the nation through the press, has served as a basis for Bible work and the extension of missionary enterprise in a country where an exclusive regime is in practice.

In September of last year, when Senor Candamo came into power, he removed the arbitrary veto of the Prefect of Ayacucho against the circulation of the Bible in that city, and ordered the Prefect to withdraw himself from harassing our colporteurs. Never before in the history of Protestant missions in Peru has such a telegram been dispatched from the supreme authority of the country, and never before has the telegraph been put to better use than in giving a mandate for a free circulation of the Bible. It was a red-letter day for Bible work in Peru.

In honor of Senor Candamo's exaltation to the Presidential chair, and in memory of important services rendered to our cause, the writer, accompanied by missionaries Cullen and Watson, presented him with a large Spanish Bible, bearing a suitable inscription. We were admitted past the guards to the elegant reception-room of the palace, and thence to his private office. We had a welcome reception from this distinguished gentleman, during which the writer addressed him briefly on the Bible and the Bible Society work. The President graciously accepted the handsome volume and, opening it, expressed his appreciation of it and of the sentiments of the address, and assured us it was his desire to see the Bible do all the good it could for his country. The Bible was then placed on the table of his elegant reception room in the palace.

The new Civil Marriage Act came from his administration, and although not perfect, marks an important stage in the outward march towards full religious liberty. It recognizes the fact that a man has a right to separate from Romanism and marry according to the dictates of his own conscience. A native Protestant Christian could not be legally married without the Roman Catholic ceremonies. Hitherto the authority to wed has been entirely with the Church. If a man was too poor to pay the fee demanded by the exacting priest, he could not be married, and the result was the creation of immoral conditions.

"Home, Sweet Home" is quite unknown here, in the sense it is understood in Protestant lands. The cause of this evil will probably be found in the fact that in the majority of cases the motive, love, which ought to prompt the marriage union, is absent, and has been replaced by passion or caprice, or in the fact that perhaps sixty per cent. of the people are living in concubinage and the children born out of wedlock. Home-life in Peru, for convenience, may be divided into two classes: that of the caballero (gentleman) and the clase obrera (working class). The house of the rich, though badly ventilated and characterized by unsanitary conditions, quite a hundred years behind the times, is large and well furnished, yet is entirely lacking in that element which constitutes a home. The home of the working classes is such as to make the moral life of America an impossibility here. Before moral development is possible among the clase obrera, better houses must be built, education advanced and hope inspired.

The supreme lack in the Peruvian home is the open Bible and the family altar. A picture of a saint and a crucifix, with an oil lamp burning dimly before it, are the paltry shrines which take the place of the living Word of God, which has made the homes of America and England what they are to-day. As we see the social conditions around us, we hope that the fire may never burn low on this sacred altar of the homes of America. May zeal and love and devotion to the Son of God and to the Word glow until the perfect day.

ESQUIMAUX COMING TO CHRIST

THE KOTZEBUE MISSION IN WINTER

FROM Mr. and Mrs. Thomas, of the Friends' Mission, Kotzebue, Alaska, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a letter giving an interesting description of the work at that remote corner of the Christian mission field. This work is supported by the California Yearly Meeting of Friends. Mr. Thomas writes that one morning several months ago—while winter yet held the land in its grasp:

"My wife attempted to reach a native igloo to give assistance to a native mother and her newly-born child. Though the distance was less than thirty feet from our Mission home, yet she could not face the flying needles in the blizzard's breath, and had to return to the Mission. At such times one cannot see more than ten feet. But such weather is not always with us, and between storms people can travel about with the help of reindeer or dog teams. We were frozen in seven months, but we received eight mails from the outside, traveling to us a distance of some thousands of miles by dog sleds.

"Yet the dear Master more than repays for all this isolation in the joy He gives us from time to time to see Esquimaux born again. We visited a village of about sixty inhabitants, almost one-half (the younger generation) having confessed Christ at previous meetings. After a fifteen-mile ride over the ice behind our faithful dogs (which we use for short distance traveling), we reached our destination, crawled through a long entrance-way, twenty-six inches in height, and found ourselves in a semi-underground chamber, about twenty feet square. There was only one window—a hole covered with seal membrane—and it was situated in the roof. The room was dimly lighted by candles and native seal-oil lamps. Around the missionaries the children gathered and lustily sang the songs of Zion, while the unbelieving old people stood about and listened. God's message was interpreted by two boys, the old people interrupting with many questions.

"One old man—a shaman, or medicine man—father of one of our interpreters, sprang into the centre of the room, talking loudly and swinging his arms wildly, and beating his breast. The lad turned to us and said, 'Our parents don't believe in Jesus.'

"Passages of scripture were read, questions prayerfully answered, and very soon the old shaman was upon his knees. Soon twenty-nine old people were earnestly seeking the 'Pearl of great price.' They were prayed and dealt with. After a blessed service, lasting more than three hours, and wrapped in our coats and blankets, we sought rest and slumber on the floor of the house.

"We arose at five a.m., breakfasted, visited at the native house, and we sang and prayed for an old grandmother, who had not been present the previous evening. The aged woman accepted Christ as her Saviour, and at nine o'clock, a.m., every native in the village was present for another spiritual feast. Five others, the only remaining sinners in the village, gave their hearts to God. When we left, in the midst of a baby blizzard, to keep an engagement in another village for that evening, we had the joy of leaving behind us a village of three-score Esquimaux—every one of whom was a confessed follower of our blessed Lord and Saviour.

"We have at present above five hundred members in good standing in our church book here, at Kotzebue. Pray that not only may these be kept true, but that others may be gathered into the fold. We have also seen a case of drunkenness, or even known of an Esquimaux here taking a glass of liquor during the past year and a-half. Blessed, isn't it! For this people, before they became 'Jesus men' and 'Jesus women,' were confirmed and habitual drunkards."

A FOUNDER OF MOUNTAIN MISSIONS

IN the mountain region of the Southern States there are nearly three hundred counties, called "Pauper counties," because there is no law by which a school tax can be levied. Nearly thirty years ago, the Rev. A. A. Meyers began a work among the natives of this locality, beginning by riding for six months, through county after county, until he selected Williamsburg, Kentucky, as the most suitable place in which to commence a permanent work. No church had ever graced this county seat, although for seventy-two years the court-house had stood there, and there were over eighteen thousand inhabitants. No missionary society could be found that would furnish the necessary funds, so Mr. Meyers bravely set to work among the citizens of the town, and so well did they respond that he soon collected over thirty-two hundred dollars, with which a church was built.

How it was built is a most interesting story. The lumber used went through a long, wearisome process before the work of building could be commenced. First, the timber must be felled in the forest, then the logs were rolled down the side of the mountain, drawn by oxen to the river, on which the logs were floated, several miles to the mills. After the edifice was completed, a bell was bought, and so enthusiastic were the people, that before hanging in the belfry it was put on a dray, drawn by a yoke of oxen through the streets, one man guiding the team, while two others rang the bell. This bell was the first that ever rang out a Gospel welcome in Whitley County, Ky.

When Mr. Meyers first began work in this locality, whiskey was sold everywhere, and caused untold suffering and crime. Human life was held very cheap. Now, Whitley County is strong for prohibition, every saloon in the town of Williamsburg having been broken up, under the local option law. In various ways the people were encouraged to help themselves. A school was established, and now Williamsburg Academy stands second to no school of its kind in the region.

Mr. Meyers had not only grace, but grit, and he scorned not to work with his own hands, hauling school-desks and other material over roads, which were roads only in name. At this time he was not only pastor and temperance lecturer, but he served as general manager and builder. Faithfulness and perseverance brought success to a task which seemed at first almost hopeless. He felt that these people had been passed by, and he ministered faithfully unto them, receiving no salary, but rejoicing that he could do anything for the sake of Him who "came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." Now he is happy in the knowledge that there are many young men and women, numbers of whom were poor girls and boys from cabin homes, now filling good positions: as judges, school-teachers, and ministers of the Gospel, who got their first start in this timely Christian seat of learning at Williamsburg.

With the help of the American Missionary Society, other churches, missions, and schools were opened. Sixty miles east of Williamsburg, Mr. Meyers found a new field in and about the famous Cumberland University, Tenn., in the district where now stands the famous Lincoln Memorial University. In the little village at that time there were only about three hundred inhabitants, but seventeen saloons flourished among this handful of people. There was not a church or school of any kind, and the first meeting was held in the National Cemetery. Not being able to procure a dwelling for a home, Mr. Meyers went to work one Monday to build one, and on Saturday night he moved into a house which had cost just sixty-nine dollars. He next built a church of his own small means, and started a school, in which every seat was taken on the morning of its opening. This little beginning developed into what is now known as the large, graded Harrow School. Its home is on a hill, in a beautiful building, purchased fourteen years ago.

Mr. Meyers also founded and opened a home for homeless girls, where they can find both shelter and training. One of the districts where this tireless man worked was called "The Lower Regions." While battling against liquor in this place, a young mountaineer said, "You may vote it out o' the rest o' the county but you'll never git it out o' the Lower Regions."

"No," said the enthusiastic temperance man, "I do not want to vote it out of the Lower Regions, but I am going to do my best to have it all voted into the Lower Regions," and in his spirit he worked through opposition, until whiskey was voted out of thirty-eight counties in the State.

Mr. Meyers is now absorbed in establishing an institution planned especially to help the women of the mountains. He has an able co-worker in his wife, formerly Miss Grace Fugate, a well-known Christian worker laboring in the same field.

Speyer's Great Cathedral Dedicated

A DAY OF JUBILEE ATTENDED BY LUTHERANS FROM MANY LANDS -- THE LUTHER STATUE UNVEILED

THE ALTAR AND COMMUNION SERVICE

AUGUST 31, 1904, will forever be a memorable day for Speyer, the ancient Bavarian city at the confluence of the Speyerbach with the Rhine. On that gala day, in the presence of assembled thousands, was dedicated the magnificent new memorial Cathedral, and the fine statue of Martin Luther was unveiled with impressive ceremonies. The whole event passed delightfully, and the venerable city, bedecked at every available point with evergreens, flags, and bunting, was a pleasant sight. For days the city had been ringing up with guests. Train after train poured in, to swell the already large number of visitors; and on the auspicious day of the celebration, the seats were packed with the multitude. It was a superb day—clear and bracing—and the people were full of happiness and enthusiasm. Very notable was the gathering which met to dedicate this new church. Besides the princes of Hohenlohe-Langenberg, Prussia and Sachsen-Meiningen, nine other sovereigns and their representatives, and there were many others with decorations indicating their high rank. Besides ecclesiastical dignitaries, nobility, and statesmen, and high officers, there were the great leaders of the German Universities, and officials from the free Hanseatic cities, and the frontier cities, whose representatives had signed the historic protest at Speyer. It was a famous assemblage, and one not soon to be forgotten. Writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the celebration, Mr. Charles J. Schlegel, one of the guests who participated, says: "In the afternoon, a multitude of craftsmen and laymen formed in line procession. A finer lot of men, perhaps, was never gathered together—men with keen eyes, refined and cultivated; faces beaming with pleasure and illumined with knowledge; every man a scholar, and possessed of charming and graceful manner. These represented the great universities, Churches and Societies of Education, Science and Arts, and Human Betterment. Three Princes represented the Kaiser, there were Dukes, and many others whose decorations betokened their high order." Americans were well represented in this gathering, and when the great procession moved, the United States delegation occupied a prominent position in the line. As the long column arrived at the church entrance, trance, a covered figure was observed in the foyer, draped in an American flag. Prof. Guembel, the principal member of the Building Committee, delivered the opening address, and was followed by a brief speech in German, by the Rev. Dr. D. Pister, of Cincinnati, O. Rev. Dr. Hamma, of Washington, D. C., made some appropriate remarks in English, and was in turn followed by Ex-Mayor Charles A. Schieren, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who made an eloquent and impressive speech in German.

Prof. Guembel again took the platform, and delivered a glowing eulogy on Luther and his work. Then, raising his voice, he cried aloud: "Great man of God, appear!" and the drapery which covered the statue at that moment dropped, and the strong and noble lineaments of the great Reformer were exposed to full view. An electric thrill seemed to pass through the vast assemblage; music burst forth, and the grand choir of 200 men and 80 women, accompanied by an orchestra of 30 pieces, swept the place with a flood of song, that was a fitting climax to a glorious ceremony.

Speyer is noted in ecclesiastical history for the meetings held there by the great leaders in the Reformation. The first diet was held in 1526. The political situation at that time being very trying to the German Emperor, the religious question was left to the States to manage, as they could best defend before God, until a council, ecumenical or national, should finally decide. The second diet was opened March 15, 1529, under very different circumstances. Francis I was suing for peace, and the Turkish hordes had retired. The Roman Catholic majority consequently decided that the mass should be restored wherever it had been abolished, that a rigid censorship of books should be established, and that every preacher who did not recognize the Real Presence in the sacrament should be excluded from the pulpit. Against these decrees the evangelical minority entered a formal protest, whence their name "Protestants." The protest set forth that the evangelical princes and estates could not sanction the revocation by a party vote of the recess passed unanimously at the last diet; that their opponents had conceded the correctness of evangelical teaching in many points, and could not therefore require its rejection by those who now receive it. In the event that the recess of the former diet should, nevertheless, be recalled by the partisan majority, the signers protested before God that, for themselves and their people, they would "neither consent nor adhere in any manner whatever to the proposed decree in anything that is contrary to God, his holy Word, our right conscience and the salvation of our souls, and the last decree of Speyer." This protest was signed by John, elector of Saxony;

2 Rudolf von Habsburg 4 Albrecht von Oesterreich

Georg, Margrave of Brandenburg, and his brother William; Philip, Landgrave of Hesse; Dukes Ernest and Francis of Luneburg, and Wolfgang, Duke of Anhalt. Besides the princes, the representatives of fourteen imperial cities also signed the protest, and then quitted the city.

The work of the Wittenberg monk had already borne good fruit. What Peter and John had said once to the Council of Jerusalem: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye," was again exemplified at Speyer. Luther's deed at Worms, grateful Germany has immortalized in the great Luther monument erected in that city. Could and should the protest at Speyer be forgotten? Worms, where Luther once uttered those immortal words: "Here I stand, I cannot otherwise; God help me, Amen!" had its memorial. And Speyer, the baptismal font over which the evangelists received the new name of "Protestants," would certainly not be left without a monument expressive of the gratitude of Protestant Germany. Nearly fifty years ago, on September 19, 1856, a few gentlemen met to consider the plan of repairing of Trinity Church, which was built after the fire of 1689. At this meeting, instead of repairing the old church, the Rev. Boersch, member of the Consistory, suggested that more money be expended and that they build a beautiful church, which at the same time could be a memorial of the diet of 1529. The plan was accepted, and the Protestants of 1529

EXALTED OVER ALL

MANY devout Unitarians, like Dr. Channing and others, have hesitated to give supreme honors to the Lord Jesus Christ, because they imagined that somehow or other such honors derogated from the adoration due to the Father alone. Such was not the view of St. Paul in our text. In this sublime passage, wherein Jesus Christ is exalted to the highest dignity possible or thinkable, such exaltation is said not to detract from but to add to the glory of the Father—so that they “who honor the Son, honor the Father also”—and, with this view, we select for the closing service of the Ocean Grove season of 1904 this magnificent passage, which, like a bow of promise, is set in the clouds, as a pledge and covenant of peace.

The text is a multum in parvo, a compendium of Christian doctrine, which has always been, and we hope ever will be, the staple of Ocean Grove's teaching. It is an epitome of God's plan of salvation, a history of the living link that unites humanity with Deity. It spans the heavens! It overarches the eternities! It is electric with the good news that rings from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven again, as it tells the story that thrills the universe with joy—the old, old story, ever new, of God's design to save the human race, that had its origin in the divine counsels before the foundation of the world, its history in the events recorded in the four Gospels, and its glorious consummation when, at the name of Jesus, every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

What great doctrine or teaching of Christianity does not this text contain? It tells of

- The pre-existence of Christ.
- His equality with God.
- His estimate thereof.
- His voluntary self-emptying.
- His holy incarnation.
- His deep humility.
- His perfect obedience, even to the death of the Cross.
- His resurrection and ascension.
- His exaltation in the heavens.
- His pre-eminence in all things.
- His acceptance of universal worship.

And the co-working of it all for the glory of God the Father.

To preserve order in our exposition it is necessary to deal primarily, as does St. Paul, with the exhortation. “Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ”—the mind or spirit which led him to divest himself of pre-existent splendor and touch the deepest depths of humiliation for the sake of others.

Mutual Helpfulness

There are two aspects in which it is possible for us to look upon our “generation.” The fifteen hundred millions who are our living contemporaries, or all those whom we influence for good or evil in our span of life. There is the centripetal or selfish aspect, in which we regard these multitudes as existing for our personal benefit as so many units to be pressed into our individual service. And there is the centrifugal or self-sacrificing aspect, in which we regard them as so many units to be blessed and benefited by our life of service. The results of both aspects may be similar, but the motives that prompt them are wide asunder as the poles. The centripetal motive is mean, dwarfing, petty, selfish. The centrifugal motive is broad, world-embracing and Christlike. David “served his generation by the will of God,” and all succeeding ages sing his psalms and call him blessed. The Master came not to be “ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life as an offering for many.” These two should be our examples in forming our life programme. The world is serving us—for, as the ships sail over the sea, it brings us products of other lands. The keels of commerce cut the oceans, and, as Sidney Smith said, the world must be circumnavigated before the washerwoman can have her breakfast. For us the miner delves, the farmer ploughs, the forester hews, the mariner sails, the soldier fights, the artist paints, the poet sings, the philosopher thinks, the preacher preaches, the editor writes, and the scientist discovers. For all them we, too, are doing something.

Do it with a centripetal motive and you develop a selfish character. “Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus.” Live centrifugally and you develop the Christian character, for the essential difference between the Christian and the worldling lies just here, in the Greek idea of self-culture or the Hebrew and Christian idea of self-sacrifice, or, better still, the highest self-culture by the sublimest self-sacrifice. “Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus.”

He was in the “form of God.” That God is spirit without form, parts or body, is one of the primal truths of Christian revelation. The term form, cannot, therefore, refer to external likeness, but to inward image, spiritual nature, likeness in moral and spiritual attributes, the mind and spiritual disposition of the divine Being. Were I to say of King Edward or Kaiser Wilhelm that they had the form of a king, it would signify that they are clad in the robes of royalty, wield the sceptre of royalty, wear the crown of royalty, sit upon the throne of royalty and exercise the prerogatives of royalty. So of the Lord Jesus Christ. He had the form of God, had the nature of God, and was robed in the splendor, glory and majesty of God.

A Glorious Pre-Existence

These are not necessarily associated with body any more than personality is associated with a body, as so many misunderstand it. Personality signifies simply self-consciousness and self-determination—I am, I do—and these we affirm of the unseen Spirit, God, as in the Epistle to the Hebrews it is affirmed that Jesus Christ is the “brightness,” the effulgence or outshining of the Father's glory and the “express image of his person.” The Lord Jesus Christ had this, and was conscious that he had it. When Philip (John 14) asked him, “Show us the Father,” he answered, “He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.” He told Nicodemus, “No man hath ascended into heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven.” The Jews took up stones to stone him, because in his affirmation, “Before Abraham was, I am,” he had taken to himself the title of the self-existent Jehovah of the Burning Bush, and in his high priestly prayer (John 17) he said, “Father, glorify me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.” “In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God and the Word was God.”

REV. WILLIAM POTTS GEORGE, D.D.

This equality with the Father does not exclude the idea of subordination to the Father. In I. Cor. 15: 8, St. Paul tells of an exception to the “all things put under his feet. He is excepted who did put all things under him; and when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that did put all things under him, that God may be all in all.” There is equality in nature and subordination in office. The dauphins of France, the Princes of Wales in England, the Crown Prince in Germany, have the same blood royalty and nature as the reigning monarch, but are subordinate in office.

The Son of God, in his prayers and sayings, recognises this subordination, while he insists on his equality. But how did he estimate this equality? Literally as a “thing not to be grasped at”—not to be seized, apprehended, held at all hazards; but looking at the things of others, he let it go. He held it, knew he held it, but voluntarily he emptied himself thereof.

The Humiliation of Death

But for this he “became obedient to death.” This was his greatest humiliation, for nothing in this world is so humbling to man as death. Speak of it as lightly as you will; cover it with flowers; lavish around it all the beauties of the gorgeous sepulchre; write poetry on it, nay, comfort yourself with the consolations of scripture. Still, as James Russell Lowell wrote over the grave of his infant daughter:

Console if you will, I can bear it,
’Tis a well meant alms of breath;
But not all the preaching since Adam,
Has made death other than death.

But there are different kinds of death. There is death in the holy chamber, where the good man dies full of years and honors, surrounded by sorrowing friends and kinsmen, who perform for him the last sad offices, smooth his pillow as the soul bids farewell to the tenement and silently steals away to its better home above. Then comes the beautiful death of Alfred, Lord Tennyson, with his hand on the Cymbeline of Shakespeare thus uniting the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries; the bridge of moonbeams showed the way for him to meet his pilot face to face, when he had crossed the bar. There is the hero's death on the battle-field of Wolfe at Quebec, leaning on his elbows heard, “T’flee! they flee!” “Who flee?” “The French!” and so on. “I die content, knowing the western world is won for Anglo-Saxon, and not Latin civilization.”

There is death in the pursuit of science, as with Francis Lord Bacon, who died in making an experiment of stuffing a fowl with snow, and went out of the world because of his persistent working for the world's benefit. Franklin, in the Arctic snows, and Gordon Livingstone in the African desert, died sure of their country's appreciation and posthumous fame.

In Anguish and Shame

When you go to Oxford, you will pause in the courtyard of Colleges to gaze on the Martyrs' Monument, erected at the place where Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley were burned to death three centuries ago, for conscience sake. On this very spot, where, at that time the howled and the fagots crackled and the fire burnt, the marble stands to-day, and as you gaze, you recall the words of Latimer, “Master Ridley! play the man. By the grace of God we will light a candle in England to-day, which shall never be put out.” And, thank God, that candle is burning still. But to die at the hands of the hangman is far different.

But the death of the Lord Jesus Christ was worse than hanging. It was the death of the Cross, a death between two robbers, a death of physical and mental agony and horror worse than tongue can tell or pen describe.

Can humiliation further go? It was the criminal's death, the felon's death, the murderer's death. He died by the sentence of Jewish Sanhedrin and Roman procurator amidst the supernatural darkness and the desertion of Deity, with the wailing cry, echoing through the universe, “My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me!”

That was his cry, and the howling execrations and coarse ribaldry of the mob, and the taunts of his persecutors were the only audible answer. This was the death to which our beloved Saviour, the Co-equal of the Father, became obedient—the death of the Cross for you and me.

Wherefore, because of this God hath highly exalted him. The exaltation follows, and is a result of the humiliation. Because he stooped so low, he stands so high. Because he emptied himself of pre-existent glory, “it has pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell.” The slave of earth becomes the Sovereign of the skies! The carpenter wins the Kingship! The Crucified of Calvary wears the crown of conquest. The hand that held the fragile reed now wields the universal sceptre. The crown of thorns is changed to many crowns of glory.

Universal Supremacy

God hath highly exalted him; how high God knows. He said himself, that now after the resurrection all authority is given unto him both in heaven and earth. In “all things he has the pre-eminence.” He is the head over all things to the church which is his body, the “fulness of him that filleth all in all.” On his vesture and on his thigh there is a name written, “King of kings and Lord of lords”—King over the material, moral, and spiritual universe. King in heaven, King in earth! King in time, and King in eternity! King over his friends, who kiss his sceptre; King over his foes, who lick the dust beneath his feet. King over the titular, and King over the real kings of earth. King over the Cæsars, and Alexanders, and Napoleons, and Charlemagnes, and Hapsburgs, and Hohenzollerns, and Guelphs, and Romanoffs. King over the Cecils, and Richelieus, and Bismarcks, and Gladstones, and Wellingtons, and Franklins, and Shakespeares, and Homers, and Dantes—King in all realms! King of kings, and Lord of lords.

How much greater is the present exaltation than pre-existent glory, who shall say? There are many crowns upon his brow now in many fields of conquest. But he has won a new title in the universe, that of Saviour, because he has saved a world that had rebelled against authority, and has opened the way for return to God of a world that had wandered from the path of rectitude and virtue.

Because of this he has now the name which is above every name. If you ask what name is this, I answer, there is only one, the name given by Gabriel to Mary in the hour of his conception. “Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.” There are many names by which he is called in the Old and New Testaments. As Captain of the Lord's Host, he was revealed to the children of Israel. Isaiah

World Congress on Sunday Rest

ONE of the most important movements of modern times is that which is to be considered at the Congress to be held in connection with the Universal Exposition at St. Louis, Mo., October 11-14. It is an effort reaching out to all the Christian countries of the world, to promote the observance of the Weekly Day of Rest. Nearly a year ago, many prominent Christian people in this country realized that the assembling of representatives of so many representatives of foreign lands, presented an opportunity for arousing public opinion throughout the world on this momentous subject. It was felt that such an opportunity should not be neglected. A meeting was accordingly held in New York, of the officers and members of various Sunday Associations, to arrange plans for the assembling of an International Congress to take the whole subject into consideration. Communications were addressed to the Directors of the Exposition, who approved of the project, and courteously consented to facilitate it. At the meeting, an Executive Committee was appointed, consisting of Dr. Martin D. Kneeland, of the New England Sabbath Protective League, Chairman; Mr. William S. Hubbel, of the New York Sabbath Committee; Mr. Alexander Jackson, of the Cleveland Sunday Union; Mr. James Yearance, of the American Sabbath Union; and Dr. Edward Thomson, of the Sunday League of America, Secretary.

J. G. SHEARER

An Organizing Committee was also appointed, consisting of representatives of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the International Bureau of Reform, and nine organizations which are working in various parts of the country for the better observance of the Lord's Day. With these two committees a third is co-operating in St. Louis, which consists of the pastors of all denominations, and twelve prominent laymen of that city, to whom is committed the task of making local arrangements. The Committees were authorized to invite special delegates to attend from foreign lands, to report on the movement for Sabbath observance in their respective countries, and to suggest plans for making the movement world-wide.

Among the distinguished men who have already signified their intention to be present and participate in the deliberations, are Dr. John Stoecker, Court Preacher to the Emperor of Germany; President Matteo Prochet of Italy; President I. W. La Fetra, of Chili; President M. T. Scott, D.D. of Lucknow, India, and Mr. Carl M. Ferreri, of Rome. Besides these, the Minister of Justice and Religion in Spain has promised to send a representative, as has the Prime Minister of Holland. Mons. Deluz, of Geneva, the Secretary of the International Federation for Sunday Rest in Europe, has undertaken to send a paper on the subject to be read at the Congress, which is sure to contain valuable information. Many other eminent persons, representing in all no less than thirty-five distinct nationalities, have accepted the invitation to the Congress, thus giving it a literally international character.

An honorary Committee has since been formed of prominent citizens of our own land, who have thus given practical approval of the objects aimed at by the Congress. Among these are Ex-President Grover Cleveland, and the Governors of Ohio, California, Michigan, West Virginia, Nebraska, North Carolina, Virginia, Maine, Delaware, Idaho, South Dakota, Vermont, Utah, New Mexico and Arizona, and a number of U. S. Senators and Congressmen.

It is extremely gratifying to find that men so eminent in public life and so justly honored for their high civic services, are interested in this great movement, and are thus testifying their concern for the keeping of the Lord's Day. If the Congress accomplished nothing more, it has done valuable work in thus eliciting from persons so influential, a statement of their attitude in reference to the weekly day of rest.

The fact that the Directors of the Universal Exposition at St. Louis, have placed at the disposal of the Congress, for the sessions, the Hall of International Congresses, and for its mass-meeting, the magnificent Hall of Festivals, a building capable of seating four thousand persons, is an evidence of their attitude on the subject. It is also authoritatively announced that a prominent journal was in error, when it declared that a proposal had been adopted to have the Exposition open during certain hours on Sunday. Dr. Thomson states definitely and emphatically that the officials of the Exposition "have never entertained the idea of Sunday opening."

The declaration of principles on which the Congress is based contains the statement: First—That its aim is "to promote among Christians the sense of the Divine purpose of the Sabbath and to secure its conscientious observance, hoping thereby to overcome the influences which now threaten to destroy this blessed rest-day."

Second—That while the State can not and should not enforce or interfere with the religious observance of Sunday, yet the weekly rest-day exists also as a civil institution, maintained by law and custom and vitally related to the well-being of individuals and of society, and to the stability of free institutions. The aim of the Congress is to promote among all classes such a true understanding of its value to themselves, to their families, and to the State, as will lead them to resist whatever tends to deprive them of it, and to sustain the just laws which protect their right to it."

We are justified in hoping from such an assembly the best results. Here, no less than in the Old World, there has been observed of late years a growing tendency to secularize the day, making it one of pleasure and social amusement. This tendency is not only reprehensible in itself, and a perversion of the purpose for which God gave it to the world, but it leads to the turning of the day to business purposes, involving the loss of the weekly rest-day, to, first, the workers contributing to the amusements, and, afterwards, of the employees in stores and factories. Every working man in the world has, consequently, a personal interest in protecting the day from desecration, apart from his religious principles. We trust that on all grounds the Congress will result in the toning up of public opinion on the matter, and the better observance of the day the world over.

his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. The same prophet calls him Emmanuel, God with us, and St. John speaks of the divine Logos or Word, which became flesh and dwelt among us. But Jesus is the name high over all. It is "at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow and every tongue confess." It is a poor and puerile interpretation to limit this universal homage to mean merely a slight genuflection or the mention of Jesus in the Apostles' or Nicene Creed. The worship given to Jesus Christ takes a grand sweep and broader scope than this. It is a universal homage. It is an eternity of worship. It is an acknowledgment forever and ever more of the pre-eminent and merited supremacy of the God-man Jesus Christ.

It began this bright Sunday morning in the islands of the far Pacific, and was sung in Australia, New Zealand and Fiji. It swept across Japan and China and Manchuria, where the dusky Orientals are fighting the battles of civilization. Northern Siberia, in the fogs, and India and Burmah, in the tropics, have heard and sung the glad evangel. Africa, the Dark Continent, has rejoiced in the light of the world, and sings praises to the Sun of Righteousness. Russia and Germany and Spain and Italy and France and the etherlands have hymned the Saviour's praises. The isles and British Islands have echoed and re-echoed the songs of Zion. It has leaped the Atlantic—nay, it has not leaped because it has been linked across the Atlantic in every ocean liner which has held its Sunday services. It has reached Canada, Boston and New York. Ocean Grove upraises its glad song of praise. Three hours hence it will be sung in San Francisco. Two or three hours later, it will be heard in Alaska and amid the palms of Hawaii. Thence, as the day closes, the final vespers will be heard till the long Sabbath dies where it began, and the name of Jesus is the theme of the universal song.

But there is more than that—not only men, but angels sing anthems of praise to the Lord Jesus Christ:

Worthy the Lamb that died, they cry,
To be exalted thus;
Worthy the Lamb, our hearts reply,
For he was slain for us.

In the fifth chapter of Revelation, John tells us of a book, which only the "Lion of the tribe of Judah," the "root of David," the Lamb as it had been slain, was counted worthy to open and read. This was the book of Redemption of Humanity by Himself. He only now can read his own works. We like to hear authors read their own works. The greatest reading of the ages, is the reading of the story of Redemption by the Living Redeemer.

When he has opened the book, Humanity alone sings its glad song of redemption, while the angels lovingly listen in sympathetic silence. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear: "And when he had taken the book, the four living creatures and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps and golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints. And they sang a New Song—a new song—saying: 'Thou art worthy to take the book and to open the seals thereof; for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation.'"

The angels shall kneel, the angels shall bow, the angels shall confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father; but only the saints—redeemed and glorified humanity only—shall sing the highest notes of the glad redemption song: "Unto him that loved us, and has washed us from our sins in his own blood, and has made us kings and priests to God and his Father; to him be glory and dominion forever and ever, amen."

Wherefore God hath also highly exalted him and given him a name which is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven and things in earth and things under the earth, and that every tongue shall confess that he is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

All hail the power of Jesus' name,
Let angels prostrate fall,
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all.

Political Amenities

SPEECHES in the political campaign necessarily touch on the character and record of the candidates, and in every discussion between men of opposite political parties, the merits of the respective standard-bearers are sure to be compared. The personal element cannot be avoided, because our Constitution places in the hands of the President large powers that he may use in situations which are not foreseen when he is elected. It is, therefore, right and pertinent that the character of the candidates should be considered.

This duty is not likely to be neglected by the speakers in the campaign. It is easy of performance—much easier than a discussion of political principles—and it affords an opportunity for caustic utterances and strong vituperation that please and enthuse an audience. The loud laughter and the uproarious cheering, which reward an orator for some stinging sarcasm or contemptuous epithet, encourage others to follow in the same course, until, in many sections, the campaign degenerates from a comparison of the rival platforms, and a discussion of the effects of rival policies, into a question of personal admiration and antipathy. The main question discussed, is, not whether the policy of the Government during the next four years shall be that of this or that party, but whether this or the other candidate shall be elected. It may be said that the latter question comprehends the former, but it makes a great difference which question is forced to the front.

There have been Presidential campaigns in which the whole question has turned on the personal character of the candidates, and voters have cast their ballots in favor of a party, the principles of which they did not altogether approve, rather than vote with the party whose principles they did approve, for a candidate in whom they had no confidence. Those were unsatisfactory elections, the campaign degenerating into one of coarse abuse and personal vilification. We may congratulate ourselves that this campaign is not of that kind; but it will be well if all tendency in that direction be scrupulously checked. The orator who turns from the discussion of political principles, to abuse of the candidate of the opposite party, deserves to be suspected of trying to confuse the minds of his audience and of endeavoring to divert their thoughts from the true issue. The old story of the lawyer who was privately informed that he could make no defence to a certain action, and was instructed to "abuse plaintiff's attorney," applies to political speakers. Let us have information and argument, but every audience should frown down an attempt to influence opinion by mere abuse. When one of the candidates now before the country is inaugurated, there ought to be no prejudice against him that is based on campaign slanders, in the mind of any citizen. Nor should the outside world have it in its power to say that in this great nation we heedlessly slander the men whom we afterwards elect to office. In this campaign, there is no reason why courtesy toward opponents should not be observed, in the press and on the platform, nor why mud should be flung at any citizen who has been honored by the nomination of his party, and may be honored by the highest place in the nation.

The Radium Clock

INGENIOUS beyond all his predecessors in the search for perpetual motion, is the "radium clock," invented by Harrison Martindale, of Chicago. In a slender tube he has placed a small quantity of radium; the tube is supported in an exhausted glass vessel by means of a quartz rod, and at the lower end of the tube is affixed an electroscope of two long strips of silver. The energy of the radium causes an electric current to pass to the silver strips, which expand until they touch the sides of the vessel, where, on coming in contact with earthed conducting or "grounded" wires, they are instantly discharged, and they fall together back into their former position. This charging and discharging occurs with absolute regularity every two minutes, marking time in beats of that length. The inventor affirms that the automatic action of his novel timepiece will continue undiminished for 30,000 years, until the energy of the radium is exhausted.

This like many other scientific theories is charmingly speculative. There is nothing really startling, however, in the inventor's claim, when we reflect that solar energy, the winds, the tides, or Niagara harnessed and applied to the same problem, would afford as good ground for claiming the discovery of perpetual motion as the Chicagoan's slender radium tube. There are a thousand things in nature that have been ceaselessly expending energy since the beginning of time, but the source of this initial force, which is the vitalizing power in all, is beyond the reach of the scientist. Only as we pass out of the realm of science into the region of faith do we obtain the clue to it. As John tells us, in Him is life, and as Paul told the Athenians, in Him we live and move and have our being. All things need renewal, the difference being only one of degree. Even the power in the radium clock must be renewed, though at so vast an interval; but He who is the source of all power, material as well as spiritual, is infinite in resource and His years have no end.

Natives as Missionaries

IN no part of the world is the lot of the missionary a bed of roses. Whether he works in India among Buddhists, Brahmins and Parsees; in China, among Confucians and Shintos; in Tibet, among the followers of the Dalai Lama, or among the gross pagans of the "islands of the sea," he is certain to encounter trouble, and to have periods of discomfort.

Just now, the missionary force in South Africa are undergoing a new and unexpected experience. Perhaps the situation may be best described by the following, from the pen of one of the leaders of the African Methodist Church:

It is charged that the cry of the African M. E. Church in South Africa, is, "Africa for the Africans," that this is political in its tendency; that it unsettles the minds of the natives, uniting them in antagonism to the white people; that it tends to fill them with foolish aspirations, the ultimate results of which are dangerous to the country's peace. It is said that native Africans should not be taught the things of God from the lips of native Africans; much less should they be taught or led by negro missionaries, born and trained in America.

It is to be regretted that such an issue should have been raised. One need only look around at the results of missionary experience with native teachers and helpers in other lands, to understand the value of such an adjunct to the work of evangelization. Wherever thoroughly trained native converts have been brought into service, they have, as a class, proved most effective, their familiarity with the language and customs of their race being invaluable. In Hawaii, the native Christians are so strong that they have a powerful and numerous missionary organization of their own. The same may be said of Samoa; and in Fiji, to some sixteen Europeans, there are 108 native workers. New Zealand and Japan also furnish evidence of the fact that native work is a growing and successful factor in missionary enterprise.

The mission field is wide enough for all the laborers, regardless of race or color, and all should be welcomed. Denominational or race jealousy or exclusiveness can only result in endless wrangling and in positive injury to the work. We have shown that it is natural that men should welcome Gospel teachers of their own color, and it would not be wise to dissuade them.

If the work be of the Lord, it will prosper and stand, despite opposition; if not, no human agency can secure its perpetuity. That such matters ultimately adjust themselves is shown by the case of the Krishta Somaj (Christian Assembly), a native organization in Calcutta, including parts of various congregations that had seceded from the control of European missionaries and decided to govern themselves. Some of the members were wealthy Christians. After seven or eight years, the experiment was abandoned, all interest having died out in the organization and the support devolving upon a few members. The Krishta Somaj is now a thing of the past. Similarly in Jamaica, the black churches, which had been working most successfully for many years under white control, decided on independence. Secession was a failure. Five times the churches were compelled to appeal to the English Board which they had deserted, and five times the Board paid the churches' debts. Lately they applied for reinstatement, and are now back in the old fold, with a debt of £35,000. Spiritual lethargy and inefficient management were apparently the principal fruits of this experiment.

We believe the South African trouble should be settled itself. The work of the native evangelists and pastors belonging to the new organization known as "The Ethiopian Church," may be an enduring work; it may be merely a transitory stage of the great spiritual campaign in that country. In any event, we think that the cry of "Africa for the African" may no longer be heard, and that instead, the rallying cry of all the workers, black and white, may be, "Africa for Christ."

The World's Desire

IT is a singular coincidence that two Peace Congresses should be called to meet at this time in the United States, and within a month of each other. In the proceedings of the Inter-Parliamentary Peace Congress, held in St. Louis, there are several points that may be very profitably considered by the Peace Congress which meets in Boston next week.

We believe this country has a high mission among the nations, which it is destined to fulfil, and that its mission lies in the direction of international fraternization. Ours was the first government to take a stand in favor of arbitration treaties, although France, having quickly adopted the idea, has won the honorable distinction of having concluded three such treaties within a little more than a year. But, notwithstanding these Congresses, Arbitration Courts, and Peace gatherings, the truth must be admitted that the real plane of peace negotiations has not yet been reached by any modern effort. It does not consist in the safeguarding of commercial interests, the protection of concessionaires, the defence of citizenship, or the elevation of national prestige, though all of these are in their proper relation, entirely appropriate as subjects of international agreement. The nation which indulges the hope of world peace, must take the larger view—the higher ground. Even at the risk of being misunderstood, it must uphold, with the utmost unselfishness, the doctrine of universal fraternization, of peace and international friendship for their own sake alone, and not for the benefits they will assure to trade, or the new fields they will throw open to commercial exploitation. Industry is the friend of peace, because under its protecting wing it thrives best, and is happy and contented. Commercialism has not its pathways with the sword and cannon, and would not hesitate to do so again, if war would assure it more profits and better markets. Almost all of the world's recent wars have had their root in bitter commercial competition and the selfish rivalries of trade.

However strong the desire of the nations may be for peace, that desire will never be gratified while the purely commercial spirit governs the deliberations of Peace Congresses and the councils of those statesmen who seek to avert future wars. Until we love Peace for itself, as a Divine messenger deserving the world's best welcome; until we recognize the great truth that all men are brothers, children of our Heavenly Father, who will it is that we should dwell in unity; until we learn to regard war and its horrible accompaniments as unworthy of the toleration of human beings, and are convinced that no principle can ever be settled by violence in a word, until we have the true spirit of Christ in our hearts, with love for all human kind, Peace will stay in her inaccessible height, with folded wing.

This is the lesson for our Cabinets and Peace Congresses. Ultimate peace must come through sacrifice, through renunciation, through brotherly love. And the nation which has the courage, born of supreme confidence in God, to show the way, and to take the initiative, will achieve such honor and glory as no other nation has ever known.

The Bible and the Newspaper

Progress of the War

REPORTS from the seat of war indicate that the Russian general, Kouropatkin, succeeded in retreating to Moukden after the tremendous battle at Liao Yang. Evidently the Japanese were unable to cut off any large part of his army, though they inflicted appalling slaughter and made a long gain by securing the strategical position of Liao Yang, which was an important base of Russian supplies. That Kouropatkin can make a stand at Moukden appears improbable. Even at Tieling, thirty miles farther on, it is thought he will not be safe from assault, and that he must go on to Harbin. Japanese dispatch states that, after a brief rest, the three armies, one of which is on the east of Moukden, a second on the south, and a third on the west will make a combined attack on the Russian positions, and that the Mikado has dispatched a new army of 100,000, with a hundred guns, to assist in the struggle. This army will bring the Japanese forces up to 400,000 men, while the Russian strength is estimated at little more than 200,000. It is stated, however, that Tieling, lying between two mountains, will be more easy of defence than either Moukden or Liao Yang, and that it may be held while the main body of the Russian army makes good its retreat to Harbin.

At Port Arthur, siege operations are progressing slowly. One fort, which is believed to have been an outpost, has been captured by the Japanese, who are bringing to it some of the heavy guns from their ships. They are of larger calibre and longer range than the Russian artillery, and will therefore turn to advantage the fort which was of little practical use to the Russians. A Chinaman who recently came from Port Arthur says that the Japanese are tunneling under the defences, and that the general in command of the beleaguered town has mined the principal buildings, intending to blow them up before the surrender, which now appears to be inevitable.

Our own connection with the war, in the arrival at San Francisco, of the Russian armed transport Lena, on Sept. 11, has happily terminated. The vessel took refuge in the harbor, in an unseaworthy condition, and it was expected that she would be allowed to remain and make repairs. That would, however, have been regarded by Japan as a breach of the neutrality laws. Communications with the St. Petersburg government were exchanged, and on Sept. 15 President Roosevelt issued an order that the ship be taken to Mare Island, and there dismantled. She will then be kept in the custody of the United States until peace is declared. This order was issued in compliance with a decision of the commander of the ship, who acknowledged that without extensive repairs she could not proceed on her voyage to Vladivostok.

A rumor is in circulation, which, however, has not been confirmed, that Japan has already stated the terms on which she would be willing to make peace. These are: the surrender of all Russian vessels in Japanese waters; the payment by Russia of an indemnity of 100,000,000; and the abandonment of Manchuria and the whole of the Liaoning Peninsula, which would be transferred to China, and Port Arthur declared a free port. Terms so humiliating to Russia as these, are little likely to be accepted without an effort in another campaign to retrieve the disasters of the war. How severe these have been in men, money and prestige, the world knows, and also how costly the stories have been to Japan. It would well if we might hope that the spectacle of the extinction of both nations would lead them and all others heed the warning of the ancient philosopher:

Be ye afraid of the sword; for wrath bringeth the punishments of the sword, that ye may know there is a judgment (Job 19: 29).

Lost His Citizenship

The experience of the man without a country, made famous by Dr. Hale's well-known work, has been duplicated in the experience of an Indian. He was once enrolled as a Seminole, but in an evil moment he elected to establish his citizenship in the Creek Nation as a member of the Cussetta town. His name was stricken from the Seminole roll and the roll was closed forever, in accordance with treaty provision. Meantime he neglected to have his name placed on the final roll of the Cussetta town, and so was shut out of both nations. He has made repeated efforts to establish his rights in the Creek nation, but without success. Nothing but a special act of Congress can restore him his lost citizenship. His loss is due to his own procrastination. How many miss citizenship in the kingdom of God in the same way. They break with the world, under the impulse aroused by some earnest preacher, but instead of going forward to conversion, postpone decision until it is too late.

Saved from Fire

A deed of daring in New York, a few days ago, resulted in the saving of two lives. A crowd surrounded an old tenement house from which smoke and flames were issuing. The families living in the house rushed out, some of whom were badly burned, through their clothes catching fire as they came down the blazing stairs. They reported that two women were still in the house, insensible from suffocation. They were on the third floor and could not be aroused. Three men in the crowd resolved to rescue them, but they found it was impossible to reach them by the stairs, which were burning fiercely. All three were athletes, and they decided on a dangerous course. They entered the next house and went up to the roof, from which they reached the roof of the burning house. There they made a human ladder. The strongest leaned over and grasped his companion by the wrists. The third slid over the others' bodies, and so reached the fire-escape of the third floor. He kicked in the window, and entering, found the unconscious women, whom he dragged to the fire-escape. There, in the fresh air, they revived. By that time the firemen had arrived, and the women and their brave rescuer descended by the firemen's ladder. It was well for the women that men so strong and fearless were concerned for their rescue. It is much to be wished that when souls are in peril, there were always compassionate Christians at hand, who, following Paul's example, were earnestly joining together to deliver them.

If by any means I might provoke to emulation them which are my flesh, and might save some of them (Rom. 11: 14)

Lost in a Volcano

A thrilling experience of a night in the crater of the great volcano of Kilauea, is described by the Hawaii correspondent of the New York Herald. He says that three weeks ago, a party of tourists from New England visited Hawaii, and climbed the great mountain under the guidance of an experienced mountaineer. They descended to the huge crater, and walked about the vast area on the cool lava. The floor is broken by great crevices, into which a stranger might easily plunge. They were led across this huge chamber to the mouth of the inner pit, where the seething masses of molten lava are. The guide allowed the visitors to look down, but they could see little in the daylight. He told them that at night the spectacle of the liquid fires was very impressive. After the return to the hotel one of the ladies of the party, a Boston school-teacher, had a strong desire to see that sight. She set out at dusk, without a guide, and, following the trail, reached the crater. She made her way to the inner pit, and soon became absorbed in the wonderful spectacle. Time passed more quickly than she thought, and when she turned to go back to the hotel, she was surprised to find that it was quite dark. She could not see the trail, and wandered about the crater in constant danger of falling into a crevice. After hours of terror and vain effort to find her way, she was found by a searching party of her friends, who, missing her, and suspecting where she was gone, hired a guide, and went to look for her. It was well that she was found, otherwise she might have lost her life. One can but wish that those whom curiosity to see the sights of the under world of morals leads into dangerous places, could similarly be found and brought back safely.

Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them (Deut 12: 30).

BRIEF NOTES

Miss Morse, a relative of the inventor of the Morse telegraph apparatus, has taken the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Jena. She is the first lady to do so.

Octave Desplanques, a famous French philanthropist, is dead. He had expended a large fortune in maintaining and educating destitute orphans, who were sent to him from all parts of France.

In New Zealand the temperance party is growing rapidly. The total votes cast in the various districts for no license at the last election was 151,524, as against the total in 1896, which was 98,312.

Mrs. Horace Bushnell is still living, and in good health. She recently celebrated her hundredth birthday at her home in Hartford, Conn. Her delight is to talk to visitors of the works of her famous husband, which are her constant reading.

Rev. Chas. Wagner, the author of The Simple Life, whose portrait and sketch of his life appeared recently in this journal, is shortly to visit this country. He expects to spend October and November here. In his letter announcing his coming he says: "I desire to have an opportunity of speaking with you, of seeing how you live, and, above all, of appreciating better than I have yet been able to do the aspects of your inward life."

At the beginning of the war between Russia and Japan, application was made to the Japanese Government by the Y. M. C. A. of Japan to allow members of the Association to accompany the various armies as evangelists. Permission was readily given, and now twelve members are with the various armies at the front.

Rev. Fred A. Rees, of Manchester, England, preached in Chicago, last Sunday, and has promised to speak at the Christian Endeavor State Conventions of Massachusetts and New Hampshire, this month. Mr. Rees has done valuable service to the Baptist Church in England, by his work among young people, and by his literary labors. He has letters from Dr. Clifford, Dr. McLaren, and other English Baptist ministers.

Rev. James Flanagan, from London, has come to the United States to hold evangelistic services. He has letters of introduction from Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, Rev. Thomas Law, Secretary of the National Federation of the Free Churches, and Rev. T. H. Hunt, President of the Primitive Methodist Conference; Rev. F. B. Meyer, President, and Rev. James Travis, the ex-President of the National Free Church Federation. His services in London, Manchester, and Birmingham, were very largely attended, and were blessed to the conversion of many souls. Letters addressed to him at this office, will be forwarded to him.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the Marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old Marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the Marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the Marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the Marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the Marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope of winning her love; though, both being prisoners, the outlook is anything but encouraging. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the Marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness.

BOOK FOUR—Egypt CHAPTER XXII

BREBŒUF SPEAKS TO THE PURPOSE

BACK in the cabin a strange scene was taking place. As Garron left the marquis and his granddaughter with Brébœuf, Aurore crept out of the stateroom which she shared with Louise, and took her mistress in her arms. The woman had not shed a tear, had not given way openly to her shame and consternation, but her body shook with nervous shudders which the faithful foster-sister in vain endeavored to suppress. The marquis stared at Brébœuf for a moment.

"We cannot abide in the presence of a traitor," he said, "Let us retire to our staterooms until we are summoned again: and may God help you, my child, for indeed I cannot."

An extraordinary thing happened as he turned away. A deep voice broke the silence.

"Wait!" said Brébœuf. The marquis stopped as if he had been stricken. He turned slowly and faced the Breton.

"Did you dare," he cried, "you false, betraying dog, to speak to me?"

Brébœuf fumbled at his belt, undid the clasp, dropped the heavy cutlass clattering down upon the deck of the cabin. His two pistols he laid upon the table. From his head he tore the hated cap that someone, in jest at his conversion to the Republic, had given to him to wear, and which he had worn ever since. He threw it at his feet, trampled upon it, and then stretched out his arms.

"Master!" he cried. The marquis moved near to him.

"What is the meaning of this? Have you turned traitor again? Would you betray Garron as you betrayed me?"

The Breton shook his head.

"Grandfather!" cried Louise, quicker of apprehension, "I see it all! He has been playing the part for you, for me! He is our friend!"

The sailor fell at her feet, took her hand in his own and kissed it, and worshiped her as if he had been kneeling at a shrine.

"Right!" he said.

"Why didn't you give me a sign?" asked the marquis.

"Don't you see, sir, he didn't dare! He had to win Garron's confidence absolutely! The slightest thing would have awakened his suspicions! He played the part well. Oh, my good Brébœuf!" she cried, turning to the old man and taking his hand again.

"Thank God!" said the marquis, "that loyalty is not dead in France!"

"Yonder," said Brébœuf, pointing to the steps lead-from the water alongside, the gentle blow of a breeze glancing the ship at the starboard gangway.

"Garron!" continued the Breton.

"Brébœuf," said the marquis, instantly comprehending. "You are a sailor, and, I swear, you are a gentleman! This is your command. I obey. I wait till you call me. Come, Louise."

The three had little time to conceal themselves in the small cabin, the open door of which was screened with a curtain which permitted them to hear everything that was said in the great cabin. Brébœuf hastily assumed his cutlass and pistols. When Garron entered in high good humor, at having escaped so early, he was followed by Macartney.

"Be seated, monsieur," he said formally. "You have come to a decision, I suppose?"

"I must go," answered Macartney. "I can do nothing else."

"You will go to-night?"

"The quicker the better."

"And the reward?"

"Arrange it as you will."

"I have drawn it up in writing. Shall I read it?"

"I will read it myself."

Garron handed him the paper, and Macartney hastily made himself master of the contents.

"Under consideration of the sacrifices made by Jean Garron, capitaine de vaisseau in the navy of France, in half of his rightful king, Louis XV, in which Garron gives freedom to and engages to surrender Le Tonnant to the English, and to use all his influence to keep the French fleet where it is and in its present state of unpreparedness, and to do everything to make victory easy for the English; and in view of the fact that Garron promises not to supply General Bonaparte with information in his possession, concerning a conspiracy, by Captain Honoré de Vaudémont, to abduct the general, Captain Robert Macartney, Chef d'escadre of the English navy, agrees to his influence; first to secure for said Garron, a pension of ten thousand francs; and second, to see that said Garron is ennobled by his rightful king when he shall have been re-established on his throne."

"Have you finished, monsieur?" asked Garron, presently.

"Yes."

"Those were the outward terms agreed upon, were they not?"

"They were! Give me a pen!"

He signed the document boldly.

"Now," he said, "I presume there is nothing more to be done, I may go?"

"You may. You will find a cutter alongside, manned by Arabs, with an Egyptian German, turned Mohammedan, as their captain. He is in my pay and under my orders. Here is a pass to permit the boat to run the guard lines. They keep negligent watch out yonder; should any one of the sloops or frigates overhaul you, this pass, signed by Admiral Bruceys, will enable you to pass free. You would better not be seen, though."

"I shall take care of that. May I have my arms?"

"Not in this cabin. There are some arms in the cutter, which are at your service. Here is also a rough chart of the Bay of Aboukir, which may be of use to you. Good-bye."

He stretched out his hand to the other, after giving him the chart mentioned.

"I don't have to take your hand. 'Tis not in my bargain," answered Macartney, rudely, turning away in evident contempt.

"Curse you!" said Garron under his breath, fixing his malevolent gaze upon the Irishman moving toward the door. Before he reached it, however, he stopped.

"One more thing," he said, "I must see the Comtesse de Vaudémont before I go."

"You can't, I say. I won't—"

"Stop, sir," cried the Irishman, "I tell you—"

"Your word of honor, monsieur!"

"You try me too much!"

He was very near the Frenchman now, his face f-

"Down!" said Brébœuf, literally forcing the captain into his seat ing to the cabin occupied by the captain on the deck above them.

Wondering, but obeying his command, the marquis and the woman, clambered up the ladder, and entered Garron's cabin. There was a connection between the two, although it had not been used since they had been on the ship. Brébœuf opened the scuttle, and led the way. The marquis' own sword, which had been taken from him when he was captured, was hanging in the captain's stateroom. Brébœuf fetched it, and handed it to the old man. His pistols, which he carefully charged, the Breton also gave him.

"Saved!" exclaimed the marquis. "His life for mine! Louise, you will now be free! We shall get the papers! Honoré is saved, France—"

"There!" said Brébœuf, suddenly, pointing to a vacant stateroom opposite the captain's room.

There was the sound of oars rattling in oar-locks passion, and Garron, though a man of courage, rank away from him.

"Brébœuf!" he cried.

Brébœuf was ready. His pistol was out. Garron dived back to see if he had heard his summons, and found himself looking into the barrel. The hand of the Breton did not tremble or quiver. Macartney popped in astonishment, while Garron fairly gasped with surprise.

"Down!" said Brébœuf, literally forcing his captain to his seat by the pressure of his heavy left hand.

"Are you mad!" shouted Garron. "What do you mean? Put down your pistol! I'll have you hanged!"

"Master!" called the Breton.

Sword in hand, the old man appeared in the door.

CHAPTER XXIII

THE MARQUIS GIVES ADVICE

"AH, MONSIEUR GARRON," said the marquis, suavely, with all the magnificent courtesy of which he was a master, "how fortunate a meeting!"

"The women, too!" exclaimed Garron, as Louise and the Breton followed the old man out of the cabin.

Macartney awoke to life at the sight of the woman he loved. He stepped toward her instantly. His movement was not so quick as hers. She deliberately turned her back upon him, stepped past him, and walked to the other side of her grandfather.

"Betrayed!" gasped out the French captain.

"You are accustomed to deal in treachery, my good friend. I marvel that you are surprised at having a measure meted out to you. Here we four men, and you are gentlemen, Brébœuf and myself, and two traitors!"

He looked at Macartney as he spoke.

"Monsieur Macartney," Garron cried piteously, "you are my ally! Deliver me from these people!"

"You coward!" hissed Macartney, "you have ruined me! You have lied to the comtesse about me! You have sold my soul for nothing! I will tell you!"

"Your word of honor!" Garron burst out in frantic appeal.

"Wait!" said Brébœuf, who had gradually untangled the confusing thread. "Liar!" he added, striking Garron heavily with his left hand. "Man!" he continued, pointing toward Macartney, as he had done once before.

"Your promise, captain! Your word!" cried Garron again.

"Chevalier Macartney," said the vice-admiral, "give me leave. I am an old man, bred in the most honorable of services. I consider that you are absolved from any engagement you have entered into with this man. If you can explain the equivocal situation in which you find yourself, I think you should do so."

Macartney hesitated. How far the marquis might acquiesce in Garron's treachery; how far the marquis' hatred of that Republic might carry him; whether the marquis might find it proper to reveal to Bonaparte Macartney's share of the proposed undertaking, in the hope of securing his own freedom and that of his party, Macartney could not tell. The very hesitancy of his mind, however, convinced him that the marquis was wrong and that nothing could relieve him, not only of his pledge but of the obligations of the situation.

"I cannot, monsieur, but this I can say, that this man never knew I loved the Comtesse de Vaudémont until hours after he made his proposition to me; and I assure you upon my word, sir, as an officer, as a chevalier of the noble Order of St. Louis, that no conviction of bargaining involving your granddaughter entered between us. That I had proposed to accept my freedom, in obedience to what I believed the paramount call of duty, is true, sir. I could do no less. There are times, my lord, when even the voice of the heart must be silenced by the appeal of duty. I would give anything that I possess or hope for, to be the husband of the comtesse yonder. To be compelled to do nothing when kind Providence had put me in possession of my desire, was death itself. Not by any means in which I may have entered with this wretched traitor, but my duty, and duty alone, sir, was I am silent. You have been a sailor, my lord, you can understand. As for mademoiselle—I cannot hope."

"It's a lie! It's a lie!" shouted Garron.

"Truth," growled the Breton under his breath.

Louise was by Macartney's side in an instant. Seizing his hand in both her own, and before he could prevent it, she raised it to her lips.

"Forgive me, forgive me!" she cried.

"Monsieur le Chevalier," said the marquis gravely. "I did you wrong. My sword and I are at your service. Should you choose—"

"Monsieur," said Louise gently, "he is an old man, my grandfather—"

"My lord," said Macartney, "say no more. May my arm perish and my sword rust before I engage with you! Your granddaughter has made amends, and now—"

Before he could say another word Brébœuf, moving with astonishing quickness, left Garron, sprang to the other side of the table, lifted a paper from it, and before the French captain could recover his breath the Breton had resumed his old position. Without a word he handed a paper to the marquis.

"Proof!" he said.

Stepping nearer the light the old man read the agreement.

"Ah!" he exclaimed, "this explains it! I understand fully now. You are a traitor even to your own Republic, Garron!"

"Captain Macartney," said Garron, "you cannot go free unless I have that paper."

"What happens to that paper is immaterial to me," said Macartney. "And you forget that I have your pass."

"What good will that do you?"

"I have but to leave the cabin, board the cutter and get away!"

"The officer of the deck will not allow you to leave the ship. Your pass is for outside the lines. Without a word from me—"

"That word you shall speak."

"Shall I?"

"Monsieur le Marquis give me leave to command your servant a moment?"

The vice-admiral nodded.

"Brébœuf," continued Macartney, "stand a little back of the captain. There! Lower your pistol until it points straight at his heart, through his back, so that no one entering the cabin can see. Is it cocked and primed?"

The Breton nodded.

"Very well. Now, Monsieur Garron, you will ring that bell on your table. When the orderly enters the cabin, you will say to him, 'Bid the officer of the watch allow Monsieur Macartney, and the Marquis de Vaudémont and his party, enter the cutter alongside, which is to be under his orders.' Just that and nothing more. If he make a sign, or gesture, or doesn't deliver the message exactly, pull the trigger, Brébœuf."

"An admirable plan," said the marquis, "then you intend that we go with you?"

"I propose it, monsieur. 'Twill be a hazardous voyage but we will be free."

"Enough," said the marquis, "we will go. But first—"

"Curse you! I——" cried Garron.

"Silence!" said the Breton, digging his pistol into the man's back. Brébœuf had little to say, but what he had to say was exceedingly to the point, always.

"First," continued the marquis, "I must secure possession of my papers."

He stepped over to the table, and began to rummage among the documents spread upon it.

"Too late!" laughed Garron, an idea flashing into his mind. "I sent them to Bonaparte this afternoon."

"Ah," said the marquis quickly, "where is the general?"

"He was to arrive at Alexandria from Cairo this evening. You may go, Macartney, since this treacherous dog has the advantage of me. But not you, Vaudémont, or if you do, your grandson will be facing a file of men on the sands to-morrow. Bonaparte will have him shot. Perhaps—"

"Hardly," said the marquis coolly.

"Why not, Vaudémont?"

The marquis was punctiliously courteous in small even as in great matters, and he demanded the same courtesy from others when he had the power to enforce it. In this instance it happened that he had. He leaned over the table, and looked Garron closely in the eye.

"Say Monsieur le Marquis de Vaudémont," he whispered gently, and Garron did so. "You wish to know why my grandson will not be shot? I will buy his life."

"With what?"

"With this."

He lifted Macartney's contract. Garron stared at him, his face bloodless with terror. It had not occurred to him what a mighty weapon of destruction this paper was in the hands of an enemy.

"Mercy!" he gasped, but as he looked into the inflexible, iron face of the marquis, he knew that his plea was in vain.

"Such mercy as I would show to a dog, Garron."

"But," said Macartney reluctantly, "I must interfere. I cannot—"

"Monsieur Macartney," interrupted the vice-admiral, at the same time covering him with his pistol, "it is your duty, of course, to endeavor to possess yourself of this paper, lest your plan miscarry. It is my duty not to allow you to have it. I am quite the equal of Brébœuf on the trigger."

Macartney smiled.

"Having done my duty, monsieur, I conceive that honor is satisfied. I am unarmed. What conditions do you make?"

"One," said the vice-admiral, also smiling, "I require your word of honor that you will not attempt to take this paper from me."

"And if I give it?"

"You may go where you will," said the old man.

"You have it," said Macartney.

"Bien!" said the vice-admiral, lowering his pistol. "Now we would better get away without delay. I shall take this document to General Bonaparte, at Alexandria, and tell him the truth. By it I shall secure, I trust, my grandson's life and the protection of my granddaughter from this miscreant. Bonaparte is a Republican; but they say he has a magnanimous heart, a respect for old age, and a sympathy with misfortune. The boat is yours, Captain Macartney. You must take us to Alexandria, and then—go where you please."

"What shall we do with Garron?" asked Macartney.

"Oh, gag and bind him, and leave him, I suppose."

"I remain," said Brébœuf.

The marquis looked thoughtfully at the man.

"Yes, that would be best," he said. "You can keep him quiet through the night. Don't kill him. I shall be back here before morning with orders, but, if there should be some delay? What then?"

"Death!" said the Breton, smiling, as if it were a matter of indifference to him.

"It must be so," said the vice-admiral, slowly and reluctantly. "If we should leave him here alone, someone might come in. He would give the alarm. We would be overtaken. I am loath to leave you, Brébœuf, but there seems no other way. But—"

"The man must stay," said Macartney. "The captain must give orders that he is not to be interfered with until morning, and the sailor must keep watch over him. General Bonaparte has a reputation for promptness and celerity. In such a case he will act immediately. The order for Garron's arrest will be here before dawn."

"I shall bring it myself," said the marquis, "if I can obtain it?"

"Gentlemen," gasped the unhappy captain of Le Tonnant, "he will have me shot—I'll let you go—I'll do anything—"

"Can you recall that paper that you sent to General Bonaparte?"

"I lied, I lied! It wasn't sent!" cried the man.

"Yes, you said you would hold it when you asked me to sign that paper," said Macartney.

"Produce it then," said the marquis.

"I destroyed it—I lost it—I—"

"No more lies!" said the old man curtly. "Now, Captain Macartney, your lesson to him."

"Garron," said Macartney, "you are to call the officer of the watch by your orderly, who will answer when I tap yonder bell. You are to say to the officer of the watch, 'Allow Captain Macartney, and the Marquis de Vaudémont and his party to leave the ship in the cutter alongside. Here is a permit from Admiral Bruyès to pass the cutter outside the lines. On business for the Republic. Please give orders that I be not disturbed during the night.' Say it over after me!"

Over and over again they made the miserable man repeat the message until he had it letter perfect.

"Now," said Macartney, "if you indicate by voice, or look, or sound; if you falter, or hesitate, or betray us by any sign whatsoever, Brébœuf shall kill you here like the dog you are!"

"And I have a weapon in case Brébœuf should fail," said the marquis pleasantly, sitting down close by the captain in the most friendly way, his own pistol covering him and concealed by the table. "Remember, a single sign, and you are a dead man!"

"The men will kill you if you fire," said Garron.

"You won't be there to see that. Besides, better death from their hands than life from yours," said the vice-admiral. "And you forget we shall have this paper to show them—" he paused significantly. "Ready, Captain Macartney?" he said, turning to that officer.

The young man reached out his hand and struck the bell. Before the officer of the watch, who was summoned by an orderly, who had entered the cabin in obedience to the signal, came in, Macartney lowered the light, and placed himself in such a position that the officer would have to push him aside to get to the centre of the room. It was as well that he did so, for Garron was as pale as death. Great beads of sweat stood out on his forehead. At a signal from Macartney, Louise placed herself next the lamp, so that Garron's face was in shadow, otherwise the officer of the watch would not have failed to notice his agitation.

Garron delivered his message quickly, as soon as Lieutenant Bauday put his head in the door. He did not dare do otherwise. The agony of the man was frightful, and he had that instinctive desire to get it over with which sometimes moves a criminal to hurry his executioners.

"Very good, sir," said the lieutenant, saluting.

"Now, admiral," said Macartney, "are you ready?"

"In a moment," answered the old man. "Aurore, step below, and fetch cloaks for your mistress and myself. My good Garron," continued the marquis, as the woman brought the garments, "I trust you will have a pleasant evening with the faithful Brébœuf. I was right, you see, when I staked my life on his honesty and fidelity, worthless as you reminded me that stake was. I will give you a subject for consideration in the silent watches of the night. That is, that it is well to be faithful to something even though it is only to that visionary affair men call the Republic. I shall see you in the morning doubtless. Therefore, I say au revoir. Come, mademoiselle. Come, Macartney."

"Curse you!" cried Garron, raising his voice.

"Silence!" said Brébœuf ruthlessly, as Macartney, the last of the party to leave, shut the door.

USES OF GOD'S BOUNTY

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON, BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

THE widow's appeal caught the sympathetic ear of Elisha: "Thy servant, my husband is dead . . . and the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be bondsmen." Elisha asks: "What shall I do for thee? What have you in your house to sell?" The widow answered: "Nothing, save a pot of oil." It is supposed that the woman urged her claim for help because she was the widow of Obadiah, who had incurred the debt, it is thought, by borrowing money to supply with food the one hundred prophets of the Lord whom Jezebel desired to kill. Were her fears well grounded, that her boys might be made slaves, so that their labor should pay the debt? Yes, it was according to the custom of the time.

Elisha says to her: "Go, borrow vessels abroad of all thy neighbors, even empty vessels; borrow not a few." She goes to her neighbors, taking her sons with her that they may bring back the jars. No one refuses her request, because she asks only for empty jars. Her sons ask: "Mother, what is the use of all this?" She answers: "It is the Lord's way of helping us." They reply: "We do not see how it is going to be done, but we will obey you." All of the nearby homes are visited, and a collection of jars is made, small and great. There is room for more jars, but the woman hesitates to ask for more. She shuts the door of her house upon herself and her sons, takes her pot of oil, as directed by the prophet, and fills the first jar, then the next, and next, and next, until many are filled. Still there is oil in her cruse; and she says to her sons: "Bring me yet another jar." They reply: "There is not one more." And then the oil ceases to flow. "Oh, that you had brought more!" she says. The widow goes to Elisha, and tells him that the vessels are all filled. Elisha says: "Go, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live, thou and thy children of the rest." She seeks out her creditor and pays the debt, and the widow had still her cruse of oil; and then gathers her sons about her, and together they praise God for the help he has given them. Then the sons set about returning the borrowed vessels, accompanied by their mother, who relates to her kind neighbors, gathered in groups, the wonderful way in which she has been delivered from her troubles.

Illustration and Application

1. The oppressor of the poor. Because olive oil is in the Bible the symbol of the Holy Spirit, let us not miss the many other practical lessons suggested by this story, and also by the manifold utility of the olive. The order of thought in this lesson is: Sin removed, the Spirit received, then debts paid and other practical duties done. Sin has three chief roots, appetite, greed and lust; of which greed is the tap-root, "a root of all kinds of evil," though not "of all evil," as a mistranslation made the Bible seem to teach, in the face of contrary facts. Every sin brings sorrow, though always promising joy; and the sorrow pictured in the beginning of this lesson, where the widow of an eminent minister is threatened with the enslavement of her boys to pay a debt, is one of many sins and sorrows due to greed, which has made even more woe for the sake of wealth than has been made by appetite and lust, whose worst work is due to the desire to make money out of these sins. As Burns said:

Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn.

The boys in our Sunday School classes, now generous, and caring more for fun and fame than for money, will some of them grow up to be just such oppressors of the poor as this cruel creditor, unless this and other lessons are used to teach impressively that ill-gotten gold brings neither honor nor joy to its possessor. There is no greater peril to the two best countries in the world than that their commendable industry will become a cursed commercialism, that will swallow up both faith and patriotism. Let us put among the ineradicable first impressions of childhood, a scorn of ill-gotten gold. Let boys be taught to hate it, as Hannibal was taught in boyhood to hate Rome, and as other boys are to-day taught to hate rum. In an instructive fable, a donkey laden with golden idols, was much flattered because people bowed on every side as he passed, until some one told him they were not bowing to him, but to the gold he carried. Let even children be taught that when gold becomes a god, and a bad or unworthy man is honored, or sought in marriage, not for what he is, but only for what he has, all concerned are making asses of themselves. Beside Henry Clay's saying: "I had rather be right than President," let us put another: "I had rather be right than rich."

2. The champion of the poor. When the poor have been oppressed, in all ages they have turned to God's ministers for champions of their cause, and seldom in vain. This widow knew very well that Elisha could not pay her debt. She came to him only for comfort and defense. Even when a preacher can help the poor more easily by alms, it is seldom the best way. Instead of pauperizing them, let him help them to help themselves. One profound way to do this is to show them that "honest poverty" has worked better than luxury for individuals and nations. Dr. Frank D. Bristol, in his great lecture on "Brains," shows that even that most perfect of poems, "Gray's Elegy," is absurdly in error in speaking of

The short and simple annals of the poor.

Since it is the poor boys grown to robust manhood that have filled the long and ample annals of the world. Only by the greatest wisdom in parents and teachers in counteracting the weakening influence of wealth can rich children be developed into strong and useful characters. They should be made ambitious, to be helpful about the home, even though the father could afford to put all the work on hired servants.

*International Sunday School Lesson for October 9, on The Widow's Oil Increased. II. Kings 4: 1-7. Golden Text: "Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed." Psalm 37: 3.

"Charlie! Charlie!" Clear and sweet as a note struck from a silver bell the voice rippled over the common. "That's mother!" cried one of the boys, and he instantly threw down his bat and he picked up his jacket and cap. "Don't go yet!" "Have it out!" "Finish the game!" "Try it again!" cried the players in noisy chorus. "I must go, right off, this minute. I told her that I'd come whenever she called." "Make believe you didn't hear!" they exclaimed. "But I did hear." "She won't know that you did." "But I know, and—" "Let him go," said a bystander. "You can't do anything with him; he is tied to his mother's apron-strings." "That's so," said Charlie, "and it's what every boy ought to be tied to, and a hard knot, too." "But I wouldn't be such a baby as to run the minute she called," said one. "I don't call it babyish to keep one's word to his mother. I call that manly, and the boy who doesn't keep his word to her will never keep it to anyone else—you see if he does," and he hurried away to his cottage home. Years have passed since those boys played on the common. Charlie Gray is a prosperous business man in a great city, and his mercantile friends say of him that his "word is a bond." We asked how he acquired such a reputation. His reply was: "I never broke my word when a boy, no matter how great the temptation, and the habits formed then have clung to me through life."

3. God's Bountiful Aid. God helps us both materially and spiritually, and the oil represents both kinds of help. When the widow and her sons did what God directed with their little cruse of oil, they got a plentiful supply by God's added blessing. The olive tree is a beautiful embodiment of God's manifold gifts of material beauty and utility. Its leaves of silvery green feed the eye with beauty, as does its outwardly gnarled but inwardly veined wood, much used for ornament. The fruit is the one relish the poor have to go regularly to pray that he might be anointed with the Spirit of power for service. And, in answer, the day of Pentecost fully came to him when he was alone in his room. For ten hours his cup of joy and power overflowed until he felt constrained to cry out, "I can bear no more." And in the strength of that new experience ever renewed he worked his life's end. As St. Bernard beautifully says, "He puts the oil of his mercy into the vase of our trust." So long as we bring our self-empty hearts he fills them with the joy and power of the Spirit.

4. Practical Religion. Pentecost should always be followed by a book of Acts. The debt-paying part of our lesson story is one for practical application. The oppression of the poor is the besetting sin of the rich; needless debt is the besetting sin of the poor. In the story, the widow probably was not to blame for the debt which she used her supply of oil to pay before spending any for her family. But those who are debt are mostly in fault also. Not without great provocation did the wise John Wesley put into the excellent practical rules he made for Methodists, that one should incur any debt without the probability of paying. To do otherwise is but a form of stealing, getting money on false pretences. Both preachers and teachers should arouse sleeping consciences to long neglected debts. "There never was a greater delusion than this, that the principles of the Gospel will remove any evil from this world without a direct application of them to that evil. When the minister, whose people were in the habit of stealing mill logs, preached upon the sin of stealing mill logs, the evil was corrected." The majority of the thieves are out of jail and not a few are in the Church, as any merchant who gives credit will testify. Walter Scott yearned for rolling hills and quiet dells. The horse and dog who hard upon the trail of deer were his delight. Even the song of the bird, every scream of the eagle, every tone of the hound was a call: "Come out!" "Come out and live!" But what right had he to pleasure? He was in debt. It called him on to effort. A half a million dollar debt cried, "Work on!" He bent then his task and turned out book on book as year by year that mighty pen flew on till they laid the king of pleasure in an honored tomb. O, Scott! for this we honor thee. Loathed be the man who owes and does not try to pay. The woman of our story obeyed the divine direction, which, in principle, is God's law for every household: "Go sell the oil and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest." Debt paying was doubtless only one part of the practical religion with which the mother in our story proved her piety genuine before her observant boys. Two Christian young men were talking of Bibles. One said:

"I think I prefer the King James' Version for a part, though, of course, the Revised is more scholarly. His friend smiled. "I prefer my mother's translation of the Bible, myself, to any other version," he said. "Your mother's?" cried the first young man, thinking his companion had suddenly gone crazy. "What do you mean, Fred?" "I mean that my mother has translated the Bible into the language of daily life for me ever since I was old enough to understand it," said Fred. "She translates straight, too, and gives it full meaning. There has been any obscurity about her version. Her everyday life is a translation of God's word that a child can read, and that St. Jerome could not better. Whatever printed version of the Bible I may study, my mother's is always the one that clears up my difficulties." Alas, for the boy or girl who mother's life or father's is a reversed version!

Speaking of neglecting debts, we come back again to the spiritual uplands of this lesson, for the greatest debt any one can neglect or repudiate, is the debt of love we owe to God. Think of a man boasting: "I have paid all my debts, except to my father!" Think even of a man saying: "I have done what my good father told me to do to others, but I do not love my father, nor even speak to him." To such "our Father" yearningly says: "My son, give me thine heart." The widow's little cruse of oil, used as he directed through the prophet, considered in connection with the manifold uses of olives, is a beautiful illustration of how a spirit-filled child or man or woman may multiply and overflow in service. Recall that other multiplied cruse (I. Kings 17: 1-16).

Is thy cruse of comfort failing? Rise and share it with another. And through all thy years of famine, it shall serve thee and thy brother.

Love divine will fill thy storehouse, or thy handfull still renew, Scanty fare for one, will often make a royal feast for two.

with their coarse bread. The oil pressed from it is also used for food, and is the chief medicine for both internal and external application. It is also the chief illuminant, used daily in lamps of rich and poor.

A story is told by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, of a French princess of the House of Orleans, visiting her uncle, the Duke of Lucca, one summer when the land was filled with flowers, and every tree bright with foliage and wreathed with the tendrils of the vine. She had never before been in Italy, and the wonderful beauty seemed to her like a dream of paradise. She fancied that the lovely landscape around her was thus decorated for her sake, and thanked her uncle with tears in her eyes for his wonderful welcome. But a poet standing by the side of the princess told her that the giver of the festival was the King of kings, and that his loving hand had made the land one bower of bloom not more for her than for the poorest peasant girl. It is a great thing to belong to that race for which all the beauty and utility of the world was prepared. And yet the feeling which the princess had was in a certain sense true. It was, indeed, for her that the beautiful festival of Nature was got up. God adorns his world for everyone who is capable of seeing and enjoying its beauty.

But miracles are always acted parables of spiritual truths and the lesson of this one is not uncertain, for oil is used all through the Bible to represent the manifold mission of the Holy Spirit, as our beautifier, our healer, our food, our light, our strength, our anointing to be kings and priests unto God. Mr. Moody told his most intimate friends how, when he was preaching at first without power, some of his friends met

Our First Presidential Election

THE FIRST PRESIDENTIAL MANSION

ONE hundred and fifteen years ago, New York and the nation passed through the experience of the first presidential election. It was a memorable period in the history of the young republic. The Constitution had just been adopted, and a little group of States, with an aggregate population of about 3,000,000, were about to enter upon a new and important stage of their development as an independent, self-governing nation. The fourteenth and last Continental Congress had adjourned on Oct. 21, 1788, after a session of 353 days, and had appointed the first Wednesday of February, 1789, for the election in the several States, and the first Wednesday in March for the votes of the electors to be opened and counted in Congress. New York, the seat of government and the official center of administrative activities, was then a city of about 10,000 inhabitants. It prepared for the great event with becoming energy.

From the historians of the day we glean many facts and incidents of that eventful period, which have a peculiar interest at this time, when the country is preparing on a vast scale for a Presidential election.

What a contrast is presented in the two contests! At the time of adopting the National Constitution, the franchise was very limited, being confined to a small body of men holding real estate and possessing certain religious qualifications. Of course, no slave had the franchise. Thus, excluding those who were disqualified by rough lack of property, or because of religion or other causes, there were in the whole country probably less than 150,000 out of the 3,000,000 who were privileged to vote.

In deciding to elect a President, the country turned, not to one man, to Washington. There was no thought of any opposing candidate; the great leader who had brought the nation successfully through so many trials and vicissitudes, was to be signally honored. "We cannot, sir, do without you," said Governor Johnson of Maryland, when he with others visited Washington, to inform him of the universal desire, "and I and thousands more cannot explain to anybody but yourself why we cannot do without you." To make any one else President, it seemed to men everywhere, would be like owning a subject while the king was by. But Washington held back, as he had at first held back from attending the Constitutional Convention. He doubted his civil capacity, called himself "an old man," and said it would be to forego repose and domestic enjoyment or trouble, perhaps for public obloquy. The acceptance, he declared, "would be attended with more diffidence and reluctance than I ever experienced before in my life." But he was not permitted to decline. Hamilton told him that his attendance upon the Constitutional Convention must be taken to have pledged him the view of the country to take part also in the formation of the government. "In a matter so essential to the well-being of society as the prosperity of a newly-formed, instituted government," said the great advocate, "a citizen of so much consequence as yourself to its success has no option but to lend his services, called for. Permit me to say it would be inglorious, in such a situation, not to hazard the glory, however great, which he might have previously acquired." Washington yielded when it was made thus a matter of duty.

Of that first Presidential election-day there is only a meagre record. Throughout the States, the votes for electors were cast in the usual quiet and orderly fashion. In New York, as elsewhere, there was virtually no campaign, because there was no opposition. In these exciting times in which we are now living, the Presidential contest comes like a gigantic quadrennial struggle, with its fiery controversies, and its vast political machinery, necessitating enormous financial expenditure. But when George Washington was a candidate, mass-meetings, "spell-binders," election workers, and the thousand things that constitute the paraphernalia of a modern campaign, were unthought of. Probably the total expense of that first Presidential election in all of the States amounted to far less than the cost of carrying through a single municipal campaign in an "off-year" in New York City.

In New York, where Congress then met, the vote was to be counted. Congress was slow in coming together, and it was April 6, 1789, before both Houses could count a quorum. On that day the electors met and gave in their ballots. The result was quickly known throughout the country. When the votes were opened in Congress, it was found that they were one and all for Washington, and he was declared the unanimous choice of the nation for President. The next highest number of votes was given to John Adams, of Massachusetts, for Vice-President, and he was declared the choice of the people for that office.

On April 7, Charles Thompson, the aged secretary of the Congress, mounted his horse to ride to Mount Vernon, to officially notify Washington of his election. It was a long trip to Virginia. At the same time, another messenger set out for Boston, to notify Mr. Adams. This is the story the historians tell:

At Mount Vernon, on the fourteenth of April, 1789, the appointment of Washington as supreme executive of the Republic was officially announced to him, and Secretary Thomson presented to him a certificate signed by John Langdon, president pro tempore of the Senate, stating that he was unanimously elected.

Washington's acceptance was mingled with declarations of extreme diffidence in himself. "I wish," he said, "that there may not be reason for regretting the choice, for indeed, all I can promise is to accomplish that which can be done by an honest zeal." In this spirit of devoted self-sacrifice, and realizing that the urgency of public affairs must require the immediate attendance of the President at the seat of government, he hastened his departure. On the sixteenth of April, therefore—the second day after receiving the certificate of his election—he bade adieu to Mount Vernon, to private life and to domestic felicity, and in company with Mr. Thomson and Col. Humphreys, proceeded to New York. But he did not omit to pay a parting visit to his venerable mother. Embracing his mother, Washington bowed his head upon her shoulder and wept, murmuring at the same time something of a hope that they should meet again. "No, George," she replied, "this is our last parting; my days to come are few. But go, fulfill your high duties, and may God bless and keep you." She was then afflicted with cancer, of which she died in her eighty-second year. Arriving in New York City, the President-elect was received by the Governor of the State, and by an immense concourse of citizens, headed by the military. Multitudes of his old and faithful officers and fellow-patriots pressed around him to offer their congratulations.

On the thirtieth of April, the ceremony of inaugurating the first President of the United States took place. Long before the hour arrived, the town swarmed with people; every tavern and boarding-house was full, and private residences teemed with guests and lodgers. Many persons are said to have slept in tents on "the Common." The Hudson was studded with boats bearing visitors, and long caravans of carts began to arrive before daybreak, from Westchester, Long Island and the Jerseys. The ceremony of the day was ushered in by a salute fired from the Battery. This was about six o'clock in the morning, and, even at this early hour, the streets were fast filling up. At nine, the church bells rang out a merry peal; at ten they summoned the worshippers, each pastor devoting the occasion to imploring heaven's blessing upon the nation and the first President.

At noon the procession that was to conduct the President to Federal Hall assembled opposite his residence in Cherry Street. There were the usual military companies—a troop of horse, one or two companies of grenadiers, a company of Highlanders in kilts—all the chief municipal officers, the Congressional committees, and the new Cabinet—multitudes of distinguished citizens bringing up the rear. By this assemblage the new President was escorted to Federal Hall, at the head of Broad Street, in Wall. At the door of the Senate chamber, to which the eyes of the whole vast multitude were intensely directed, the Vice-President met Washington, and with unaffected ease and grace of manner, said: "Sir, the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States are ready to attend you to take the oath required by the Constitution, which will be administered to you by the Chancellor of the State of New York."

"I am ready to proceed," was Washington's dignified reply.

The Vice-President led the way to the outside gallery; the President followed, with as many of the functionaries as could find room, and all were presently gathered on the balcony fronting on Wall Street. Of the group, perhaps the most striking person was Chancellor Livingston. Secretary Otis carried the Bible on a crimson cushion, and near him were Gens. Knox and St. Clair, Roger Sherman, Hamilton, and other noted persons of revolutionary fame. The Chancellor administered the oath, with great deliberation and emphasis, to Washington, who, bowing down, seized the book, kissed it, and exclaimed with much emotion:

"I swear, so help me God!"

"It is done," the Chancellor declared, and, turning to the crowd exclaimed, "Long live George Washington, President of the United States."

Washington, on taking the oath, as administered by Chancellor Livingston, laid his hand upon that page of the Bible containing the fiftieth chapter of Genesis, opposite to which were two illustrations of the text, one being a picture of "The Blessing of Zebulon," and the other of "The Prophecy of Issachar."

The inaugural address was pronounced in the Senate chamber. From the Senate chamber, the President was escorted to St. Paul's Church, where he heard an appropriate religious service, conducted by Dr. Prevost; and thence home to his house. In the evening the whole city was one blaze of illumination. Washington himself went down town, toward the Battery, to see the spectacle, of which he expressed the warmest admiration; returning about ten o'clock on foot, the crowd being too dense for a carriage.

And so ended the first presidential election.

CLOSING DAYS AT OUR CHILDREN'S PARADISE -- LAST SABBATH SERVICE

THE closing Sabbath for the season of 1904 of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home was a never-to-be-forgotten event in the history of that beautiful charity. Dr. Klopsch was present as usual, and with him his wife and children. Rev. John Parker, seventy-nine years of age, a Methodist pastor for upwards of fifty-eight years, was the principal speaker.

After a service of song, the opening exercises, consisting of the recital of the 1st and 23d Psalms, followed by a heartfelt earnest prayer of thanksgiving to God for his kind and loving protection, were conducted by Miss Helen Collins, Superintendent of the Home. Then the children heartily sang the Bible verses taught them by the teachers during the previous few days of their sojourn at the Home. Rev. John Parker, who for nearly eighteen months has been an invalid, was introduced by Dr. Klopsch, who said that Mr. Parker's presence, considering his long illness and nearness to death on several occasions, might be considered as almost a miracle. It reminded him of a story he had once heard of a little girl, who, returning home from Sunday School, was asked by her mother what she had learned. She replied that the lesson was about a man who took walks with God. She said they took walks often, and one day they took a long, long walk, much longer than usual. They walked, walked, and walked, until at last God said:

"Enoch, you are a great way from home. You had better come in stop with me."

"If Brother Parker," the speaker continued, "had gone a few steps further towards the pearly gates, these would probably have opened and God would have said: 'You are far away from home, John. Now come in and abide with me.'"

Mr. Parker then addressed the children and it is indeed to be regretted that no stenographic report of that most inspiring address was taken. Two hundred and forty-nine pairs of eyes and ears were wide open, and every word was taken in with an eagerness that promised a good planting and a glorious harvest in results. Then Mr. Parker sang "Eternity," and an original hymn, entitled, "I am the Door." This was followed by the teachers singing the hymn made famous by Mr. Alexander on his evangelistic tours, and now known throughout the world as the "Glory Hymn." Dr. Klopsch then made an address, containing two short but pertinent stories, the one appealing to the girls, the other to the boys. The first one told of the visit of a pastor to the home of one of his parishioners. The mother received him cordially, and reported that all was well with the whole family, except the eldest daughter, who would not give her heart to God. The mother was greatly distressed, and asked the pastor to say a few words to interest the girl. To this he readily assented, and the girl was called in, while the mother retired.

After an exchange of greetings, the pastor said: "Well, Sarah, I hear you are not yet converted. I presume they are talking religion to you all the time, until you get wearied of them."

"Yes," she replied. "They are after me all the time."

THE OLD CHAPEL AT MONT-LAWN

"But, Mary, you do intend at some time to make your peace with God, do you not?"

"Indeed I do," replied the girl. "But not yet. I want to have a good time for awhile before I give my heart to Him."

"Well, how long do you expect to wait? Shall we say about five years?" inquired the pastor. "Suppose we now get down and have a word of prayer, and say to God that not until after five years will you consider the matter of accepting Christ as your Saviour."

"Oh no," replied she, "not that long."

"Well, let's say, three years."

"No, pastor, I would not like to promise not to seek salvation before the end of that time."

"Well, let's say one year. That is but a brief span."

"No," replied she, "I cannot do that. Think of it, I may die before the end of the year, and how terrible it would be for me to die under such conditions."

"Very well, let's say six months and leave it there."

"No, really, I could not say that I would wait even six months."

"Then, Sarah, if you are afraid to put it off for a brief space of six months, why not do it now?"

And then and there, they knelt down, and Sarah gave her heart to God.

Following this story, a page out of the history of Admiral Farragut was given for the benefit of the boys.

Admiral David Glascoe Farragut, the hero of Mob Bay, when only nine years of age, prided himself that he could smoke like a chimney, drink like a fish, swear like a trooper, and do card tricks like a gambler. One day immediately after dinner was over, his father sent ten people out of the room, and he and young David alone remained. When the door was shut, his father walked up to him and said:

"David, what do you mean to become, sir?"

"I mean to be a sailor and a captain like yourself."

"What!" said the father. "A boy with your habits? Never. You will be a drunken sailor before the mast, be kicked fore and aft, to die in a fever port and have your carcass thrown into the sea. That is what will happen to you, unless you change your habits."

Farragut afterwards said that he was stunned, but he could not but admit that his father was right.

"I made up my mind at once," said he, "to give up smoking, gambling, drinking and swearing, which I then and there. That same year I was converted to God and that turned the current of my entire life, accordance with the promise contained in the Bible: 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things will be added unto you.' From the time that I gave my heart to God, my career has been onward and upward."

After the closing of the service, singing, "My Father has Many Dear Children," the school marched out, and soon scattered over the green lawns and under the numerous trees which have afforded shade and protection to the 20,000 little children who have, since the opening of the Home, enjoyed the hospitality of the veritable Children's Paradise.

were to be honored by a memorial church. Royal sanction was obtained Jan. 31, 1857, and the society was called Retscher Verein (from the palace of the family Retschin, where it was supposed the protest was handed in). The project made slow progress for many years, but on Feb. 1, 1882, when the name of the organization was changed, to "The Society for Building a Memorial Church of the Protest at Speyer in 1529," there were 250,000 marks available in the treasury. Emperor William I., his son, the Crown Prince Frederick, the present Emperor of Germany and other notables, took an active interest in the project, and on Sept. 19, 1890, the building-place was dedicated, where now stands the majestic Memorial Church. The late Henry Villiard, of New York, and several other Americans were closely connected with the project at this time and gave generous aid. The expenses up to July 1, 1904, amounted to 2,127,660 marks, of which Americans contributed 130,369 marks.

The Memorial Church, which is nearly 72 metres long (about 240 feet, a metre being 39.37 inches), has 1,440 seats, 952 below and 488 in the galleries. It has a beautiful Memorial Hall, 21 metres high and 11 metres wide, in which stands the Luther Statue, a gift of the German Lutherans of America, through Hon. Chas. A. Schieren of Brooklyn, who was chiefly instrumental in collecting the fund for that purpose. Many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are represented in the contributions to the Luther Statue. Each of the protesting cities is represented in the Memorial Hall by its coat-of-arms, a gift of these cities. Over the portals are three windows representing scenes of the Reformation period. One window represents Luther's burning of the Papal bull before the Elstergate in Wittenberg, Dec. 10, 1520; the window to the right shows the Elector Frederick the Wise and Franz von Sickingen, and that on the left Duke Ludwig of Zweibrücken and Elector Ott Heinrich of Heidelberg.

From the Memorial Hall three entrances lead into the church, some of the pillars of which were donated by W. Zeigler of New York. The small windows under the galleries represent pictures expressive of Faith, Hope, Charity; thus the stoning of Stephen represents Hope; the Centurion of Capernaum and the offering of Isaac, show Faith; Mary and Martha, Charity. Over the galleries to the right, the windows show: 1. Luther nailing the thesis; 2. The theses of Jesus: the sermon on the mount, with the beatitudes; 3. God's thesis: the legislation on Sinai. To the left, the windows show: 1. Calvin's call by Farel in the year 1536; 2. Paul's call near Damascus; 3. Isaiah's call, with the angel's song in the pedestal: "Holy, holy, holy," etc. Over the transepts are two rosettes, each with stained windows, to the right and to the left. The rosette to the right shows, in the ten outer circles, the portraits of the apostles; that to the left, the representatives of the Reformation. Besides the rosettes, there are eight windows representing the life of the Saviour. Very attractive, in addition to the beautiful windows donated by the Emperor and Empress of Germany, is the pulpit, costing 20,000 marks, the gift of J. Pierrepont Morgan of New York, decorated by four bronze sheets showing: 1. The birth of the Lord; 2. The baptism of the Lord; 3. The bearing his cross; 4. The resurrection.

Of the 102 pews, fifty have been donated. Of the American founders may be mentioned Gustav Schwab, Albrecht Pagenstecher, Seth Low, Samuel Sloan, Jan C. Carter, R. T. Wilson, George F. Barker, William Tod, Chas. R. Flint, Charles Lanier, F. S. Bowdoin, Edward Cooper, Morris K. Jessup, and Levi P. Mort of New York; Catharina Slip, Chicago; the Protestants of Richmond, Ohio. One window over the steeple was donated by Mr. Woerschoffer, of New York, a Oswald Ottendorfer and W. E. Dodge gave two iron railings. In the belfry hang five bells, weighing together 457 hundred-weight. One is the "Kaiser Wilhelm Bell," for which French cannons have been used. It is the picture of Wilhelm the Great. The second bell called the "Gustavus Adolphus Bell," with the picture of the King of Sweden. The third is the "Luther Bell" with Luther's picture, surrounded by the six evangelical princes who signed the protest at Speyer, April 1529. The fourth is called "Bavaria," a gift of Heilmann-Bonn. The fifth bell, "Evangelische Arbeitervereins-Glocke," given by the Evangelical Workmen's Union of Germany, with the inscription, I. Pet. 2: 17. Over the belfry towers the pyramid, forty metres high, looking out into the fertile plain of the Rhine.

We have given but a faint description of this monumental building, which is a lasting reminder to the world that Protestantism consists not in protesting against the truth by tearing to pieces the mighty fortress of the Word of God, but in upholding the truth and defending it, as revealed in that Word.

By Way Of CONTRIVANCE

By Margaret E. Sangster

WHAT did you say, Burchard? Frank Conrad in love? With whom, pray?"

"With little Molly Bigelow, bless her heart, the youngest but one of the Bigelow girls. They are all pretty; but there are seven of them, and they don't seem to realize how nice they are."

"But what ails Frank, if he's in love, not to court Molly. He seems sort of down-hearted."

"Indeed he well may be, Aunt Charity. Courting a Bigelow girl is like storming a fort. He can't get thin speaking distance. Jack Elmore tried it, aunt. He was in love with Marjorie Bigelow, and I'm reasonably sure that she favored him; but then when he went to see her, he was routed, horse, foot and dragons. He gave it up and retreated in good order, stopped calling week evenings and Sundays, and went out his business. If Marjorie felt it she was too proud to show it, poor lass."

Burchard Miller was a Scotchman and a bachelor, so took an interest in the affairs of his young friends. His Aunt Charity was old in years, but young in heart. "Was he not kindly received?" she asked. "I've always thought the Bigelows most hospitable and most urbane. They almost keep open house for their ends."

"Indeed they do, Aunt Charity. That's the worst of Jack used to call, hoping to see Marjorie; and first Madame Bigelow would come in, and then Mrs. Bigelow, in the most beautiful gown, all lace trimmed, and amonds sparkling at her throat, like a queen, and it's a rule that you take notice of nobody else when Mrs. Bigelow's in the room. The girls drift in one by one, a whole seven; all polite, all subdued, all meek, exactly like seven daisies in a field. Marjorie, who was the sweetest daisy of the lot, Jack thought, would smile at him, but he never got a chance to visit her, and she gave it up. He married Ethel James, an only daughter. Marjorie was one of the bridesmaids."

"Ah, yes, I remember." Mrs. Miller meditated. She was a rich widow with a big house and wide grounds. A brook was hers that never babbled its secrets to the world, and an enchanting land-locked lake in miniature, where sweetarts might canoe, if they pleased.

"Burchard, what do you want me to do? Speak, or boy."

"This, aunt. Invite a house party for a week, and include Molly Bigelow and Frank Conrad among the guests. Don't ask another Bigelow girl, even if their mother suggests it, as she probably will, and don't accept a substitute. Make it clear that Miss Molly is the one you are sending for."

Aunt Charity nodded. "I think I can manage it. I'll give round and give my invitation in person this afternoon. You make your list, Burchard, of the men, and I show you mine of the girls. I'd like the house to be brightened by a little young life."

Mrs. Miller had very little difficulty in assembling her house party, though she was obliged to exercise diplomacy to secure Molly. Molly's mother, one of those fully invincible women, who conceal iron strength under velvet smoothness, tried in vain to have Julie or Katherine asked, instead of Molly.

"Julie plays so finely, and Katherine is so pretty, but Molly is such a baby, hardly out of the schoolroom. I really think you'd better let me choose for you among my girls. My rosebud garden of girls," she added with a laugh, sweet and silvery. Mrs. Miller understood how dominant was this mother's personality, and, a flash, saw that her daughters were overshadowed when she was in the company. Indeed, Mrs. Bigelow regarded to herself the right of monopoly if a man, young or old, was within reach. As a girl she had been a beauty and a belle. As a matron she was still attractive, and in the splendor of her charms she gave her daughters no opportunity to be themselves. They were simply her shadowy satellites.

Molly, in a flutter of joyous excitement, with a handful of dainty frocks, arrived by the same train that brought Frank Conrad. The first night he took her in to dinner. Their conversation at dinner was so entertaining and absorbing that they had to finish it in the conservatory. There was music in the drawing room, and on the veranda several young people were talking up and down. As Burchard always maintained, his aunt's house was Liberty Hall; one could do what one liked there, and the good times were unchecked by any burdensome restrictions.

"Wouldn't you like to walk to the edge of the lake to see the moon shining on the water?" asked Frank. "It's a magnificent evening."

"I should love it, but mother said that I was to stay with the others, and particularly near Mrs. Miller, and I know she wouldn't like me to talk so long with you."

Molly blushed.

"Oh, if I bore you!"

"But you don't. Only I've never talked so long with any one person in my whole life, as with you to-night."

"See here, Molly Bigelow, we are under Mrs. Miller's roof, and she is responsible for us. To please you," he continued, looking gravely into Molly's flushed face, "I'll ask her if I may walk with you to the lake's edge, through the garden, in this moonlight. May I?"

"Has anybody else asked permission to do anything else that's nice to-night?"

"Why, not that I know of. But you have a very sensitive conscience, and I'd prefer to set it at rest. Come along, we'll both go to her."

Aunt Charity in her black silk gown, with her white shawl thrown over her ample shoulders, beamed benevolently upon the two when they stood before her. She smiled on Molly so lovingly, that Molly felt for almost the first time in her life, that a mother might be something besides a commander-in-chief.

"You run along, my dears," she said. "Frank, I put Molly in your charge. Molly, you may trust Frank Conrad to the last drop of his blood. He's true and tried, and I've brought him up. Now, hurry on, before the moon gets under a cloud. Frank, you bring the little girl back soon, do you hear?"

A picnic was on foot for the next morning, and though they went in a group, with Aunt Charity for a chaperone, arrived at the picnic ground the young people separated and went about in pairs. Again Molly discovered that Frank Conrad was her partner, and, seated under a leafy chestnut, they found themselves growing confidential, and Frank began telling Molly some of his hopes and plans.

"I'm going to South America! Did you know it?" he said. "We railway engineers have to be rolling-stones more or less."

She looked startled.

"When do you go?" she ventured.

"Six weeks from to-day," he replied, taking out a memorandum book. "I hope," he said in a low voice, "to be married before I go."

She drew away perceptibly. "Married! I had not heard that you were engaged. Who is the lady?"

"I am not at liberty as yet to mention her name, but she is the loveliest, most fascinating, most bewitching girl in the world. She is without a peer."

"Indeed!" said Molly, frigidly. "If you are to be married so soon, Mr. Conrad, I wonder at your wasting time here. You should be at your fiancée's side."

She rose to her feet.

Frank Conrad rose too.

"Molly Bigelow," he said, "are you utterly blind? Don't you know what I mean? My dear, you are the only fiancée I can ever desire. I know I'm frightening you, but you are the girl I mean to marry in less than a month from now. You, you, only you. Why, child, I've been courting you for six eternal months, with your mother looking on. Didn't you know it, dear?"

He looked into her eyes. The sound of voices was not far away. They could hear the murmur of talk mingled with the murmur of the wind in the pines. They could even hear the clatter of dishes, where, a little way off, the tables were being set for luncheon. Yet they were solitary, standing on the pine needles in a little copse that had been meant for lovers, and was the very fittest spot on earth for a betrothal.

Frank looked into Molly's eyes, a look tender, compelling, attracting. He spoke softly:

"Molly, will you be my wife?"

"Oh, Frank," she answered, and her eyes fell. He stooped and kissed her on the forehead. The kiss was as light as a bit of thistle-down, but her swift blush responded to it like kindling flame.

"I am the happiest fellow on this side of the Atlantic," he exclaimed. "Molly, Molly, you are willing, aren't you?"

"Yes, Frank," she whispered; "but wait till you see mamma, before you say you are happy. She'll be furious. Mother thinks I am only a little girl. I don't know how we'll ever tell her. She'll say you must marry Julie or Barbara, and she'll send me away to school."

"You darling little goose! It's not Barbara nor Julie that I'm in love with, but you, and they are not in love with me! You are, aren't you, Molly?" he demanded, jealously, his arm around her.

"Yes, Frank, I am."

"Then, Molly, kiss me," and his lips touched hers.

There was a scene at the Bigelows' breakfast table the next morning. Letters were always waiting by the plates when the family came down stairs.

Mr. Bigelow opened his mail in a leisurely fashion, expecting nothing more exciting than a bill, or a letter from some relative, business correspondence of importance confining itself to the office. But this morning was exceptional. He read a letter, frowned, read it over, then exclaimed with emphasis, "Upon my word, mother! There is to be a wedding in this family, it seems!"

"Whatever can you mean, John?"

"What I say. Frank Conrad, in a most manly letter, asks my consent to his marrying Molly. He has already secured her promise, it appears!"

"I am much displeased with Molly," said Molly's mother. "I told Charity Miller that she was far too young and immature to be trusted from under my wing. That a daughter of mine should flirt, should misbehave in such a shocking way, makes me extremely mortified. John, what in the name of all that's sensible do you see to laugh at in this extraordinary situation?"

Mr. Bigelow restrained his mirth.

"Our daughter Molly is nineteen, Matilda, and you were not quite eighteen when you married me. Frank Conrad is twenty-six, is a rising engineer, belongs to a good family, and is, in short, a very desirable son-in-law. What puzzles me is when it occurred to him to court my Molly?"

For once Mrs. Bigelow was crushed. One and all, her family were against her.

"Why, mother!" said Marjorie, "Frank Conrad has been worshiping Molly this long time, but he never has had the least opportunity to let her know it, because he's always had to talk to you. As a household we are overpowering. There are so many of us, and we are always, all of us, in evidence when a man calls. I, for one," and Marjorie sighed, "feel very much like sending Molly congratulations by telegraph. What a blessing for her that Mrs. Miller had this perfectly providential house party just now."

"Why, Marjorie!" exclaimed Mrs. Bigelow. Not yet had it dawned upon her that her girls were in rebellion: that they thought her anything but their best friend. No glimmering that Marjorie had borne a heart-ache was hers. Had she known it, she would have been very sorry.

"Jack Elmore was in love with Marjorie, mother, before he ever looked at Ethel James." This was from Barbara. Marjorie had left the room.

And now Madame Bigelow spoke. She was a ponderous woman, sixty-five or thereabout, still accustomed to supremacy in her world, as her daughter-in-law was in hers. She addressed the latter:

"The question at issue is, 'What shall John say to Frank Conrad?' is it not?"

"As to that," replied her son, "I shall wire my consent. The young people will be at home this evening. The wedding is to take place almost immediately, and you, my dear," addressing his wife, "will have your hands full, seeing about the trousseau. Frank expects to be ordered to South America very soon, and intends to take his wife with him. When Mollie is married, I shall invite you, Matilda, to take a trip abroad with me, and if there are any more strenuous courtships on the horizon, we'll leave them a clear field."

Mrs. Bigelow had nothing to say.

THE BRIGHT SIDE

WE may not always see it,
The other side of pain,
The other side of trial,
And the sun above the rain,
But in this world are mingled Forever, shine and shower,
And both are bringing gladness,
Each in its own good hour.

The side that covers over
Our path may not be bright,
But somewhere nearer heaven
It glows with glorious light
The lowlands may be misty,
And steep and rough the way,
But in God's uplands ever,
Abides the perfect day.

THE BAPTISMAL PROCESSION

Schwerin, Prince Henry of Prussia, and Prince Louis of Battenberg, who represented King Edward. A squadron of blue Cossacks on brown chargers closed the procession. In the chapel the little Czarevitch was held by the Princess Galitzen, he was dressed in pale blue robes and lay upon a cushion of the same hue. The baby weighed but ten and one-half pounds yet the services of two grand high officials were required to help in carrying his pillow and veil. When his highness was immersed in the water he cried loudly, his cold bath being evidently as much of a surprise as if he had been of birth most plebeian. At the grand reception which followed, his Imperial Majesty, the Czar, wore a light blue uniform, the Dowager-Empress appearing in light-colored heavy brocade. As the Czar moved among his guests, he seemed in most excellent spirits. The picturesqueness of these magnificent ceremonies was greatly heightened by the ladies attending wearing the ancient Muscovite national court dress; this in obedience to His Majesty's command. While the infant Prince was being taken back to the Alexandra Palace, the Czar entertained nine hundred guests at lunch. The Czarina rose on the day of his baptism, for the first time since the baby's birth.

drew his first breath. Great pomp and ceremony attended the christening, as recently described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It was on August 24th, that the Czarevitch was taken from Alexandra Palace to the chapel of the Peterhof Palace, to be given the name, and title, "The High-born Heir Apparent, and Grand Duke Alexis Nikolaievitch." The baptismal procession was preceded by a body of trumpeters mounted on snow-white horses, these being followed by a squadron of the bodyguard in scarlet uniforms; then came a detachment of red Hussars riding splendid gray Arabian horses. Four gilded coaches followed, each drawn by eight white horses. In the last of these coaches was the mite of humanity, whose advent into the world has been heralded as so important, as affecting the destiny of all Russia.

The baby rested in the arms of Princess Galitzen; the cradle was also in the carriage. In the other coaches were the Czar, his mother, the Queen of Greece, the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-

Answered Prayers

A HERALD Reader, Gap, Pa. "He is able to help all those who come to him in faith, believing."

A. L. "I wish to acknowledge God's loving kindness in answering special prayer many times. Even while yet speaking, the answer comes. I take all my troubles to him, and he never disappoints me."

Mrs. H., Burl, Ia. "Seeing the account of many of God's children in answer to prayer, I wish to tell others of his wonderful goodness to me, in hearing and answering prayer. I hope this will help others to trust him."

Lalla McL., Collins, Miss. "I desire to acknowledge answered prayers. One of mine has been answered recently that was great blessing to my family. I know He who rules the world will answer a prayer sent to Him, believing He is able to answer."

Mrs. John C. "The Answered Prayers column is a great blessing to me. I know God is a prayer-hearing and prayer-answering God. I was in deep trouble, but I took it all to God in prayer, and he surely heard and answered, for which I praise his holy name."

Old Subscriber, Hartsells, Ala. "The Lord hears and answers our prayers, if we will only trust him. I have long prayed for the conversion of my two boys. He has heard me, bless his holy name. I am praying and trusting him to remove a great trouble, and I believe he will hear me and answer in his own good time and way. Trust him."

Miss Pearl P., Merit, Texas. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers for the recovery of a sick friend. While I was yet on my knees praying, God lifted my burden and wiped away my tears, by saying, 'He will live.' Dear readers, his promises are ever faithful and true. Praise his holy name."

Harry E. K., Boulder, Colo. "I have received much benefit from reading the Answered Prayers, and wish to gratefully acknowledge God's goodness to me in answering my petitions in a time of great anxiety and difficulty. The following verses, I, Peter 5: 6, 7, have been very helpful to me: 'Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God that he may exalt you in due time.' 'Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you.' May we not all more fully realize that God does care for us and is ever ready to help us in time of need."

A. B., Newark, N. J. "I prayed to the Lord and he answered it. I want to thank him and serve him always."

A Reader, Alabama. "My prayers have been answered without number. Glory to his name, for He surely hears those who call upon Him. The column of Answered Prayers is great comfort."

M. E. R., Madrid, N. Y. "I want to bear my testimony that prayers are answered. I prayed for the conversion of a young friend who was living a dissipated life, and thank God he is now converted and living a life of communion with God."

Mrs. O. T. D., Arlington, N. J. "I promised the Lord some months ago that if he spared my baby, after a very critical operation, when all hope seemed lost, I would make this acknowledgment of it. She is a well girl to-day, and I have been given strength to care for her during the months she was convalescing. Many other prayers have been answered, and I praise His Holy Name."

Mrs. M. H. B., Los Banos, Calif. "I promised the Lord if he would answer my prayer, in sparing a dear relative's life who was very ill, and restore him to his usual health, that I would acknowledge it. He answered, and I cannot praise him enough for his goodness to me. He has directly answered my prayers many times before, and I take all my cares and trials to the Lord, for I know he will incline his ear to me."

E. G., Lupton, Mich. "I desire to add my testimony to the list of Answered Prayers. How often we can see the result in answer to our prayers; and also the kind hand of providence in leading us in a way we know not. Let us continue to follow in that strait and narrow path, that will finally bring us home."

A Believer, Canastota, N. Y. "Influenced by the testimonials in Answered Prayers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I promised the Lord if he would answer a certain prayer of mine, I would publicly acknowledge it. He answered me, for which I sincerely thank him. I also wish to thank him publicly for other answers which he has given me."

M. W., Vermont. "God has recently answered one of my prayers in a way I did not look for. Through long weary months of sickness he has been with me all the way. My heart is full of thankfulness to him."

An experienced camper selects his outfit for its compactness, discarding everything bulky and superfluous; but cut the list as he may, there's soap—that he can't do without. Ivory Soap will answer all purposes and prove best for the dishes, pots and pans, and clothes, but above all—for the bath at sundown, when, after a hard day's tramp, that makes the muscles harder, the lungs stronger and the brain quicker, he has a healthy tired feeling.

Son, I Loved Thee Long Ago*

FANNY J. CROSBY

VICTOR H. BENKE

1. Far a-way my stepshad wandered, Long in paths of sin I strayed,
2. Thro' His mer-cy He received me, All my sins He wash'd-a-way,
3. Come to Him, O heav-y-la-den, On-ly trust, and He'll for-give;

'Till my way-ward heart deceived me, And the world my trust be-trayed;
At His feet I knelt and praised Him, For the joy I found that day.
To the cross, where once He suffered, Lo, He bids thee look and live.

Then I cried there's none can help me, None whose love can soothe my woe,
Now a-mid the verdant pastures, Where the tran-quil wa-ters flow,
If by faith and true re-pen-tance, Thou wilt ask His love to know,

When I heard a voice that whisper'd, Son, I loved thee long a-go.
Still I hear His voice re-peat-ing, Son, I loved thee long a-go.
Sure-ly, thou wilt hear Him an-swer, Son, I loved thee long a-go.

CHORUS.

Long a-go, . . . long a-go, . . . Son, I loved thee long a-go, . . .
Long a-go, . . . long a-go, . . .

O how sweet the voice that whisper'd, Son, I loved thee long a-go, . . .

THE BENKE MEMORIAL

THE fund for the memorial tablet to Victor H. Benke, "The Volunteer Organist," is steadily growing. The tablet which will be placed on the wall of the Bowery Mission is of appropriate, though simple design, and will serve to commemorate the ten years of work for the Master which Mr. Benke gave after his conversion. He died literally in the harness, his last appearance being at a concert, the last of a season's series. He was even then stricken with mortal illness, but so anxious is he for the success of the entertainment, and so much was his heart in the work, that he would not be persuaded to give up, and when he lay down that night, it was never arise in the body. His work was done, but his songs will live in the hearts of all who hear them, and his memory will never become dim to those who know how he labored for the salvation of men, who, like himself, had felt the iron of remorse for aged years enter their hearts.

The hymn printed above, was one of "The Volunteer Organist's" latest compositions; Miss Fanny Crosby, the well-known blind poet and writer of hymns, composed the words.

All contributions to the Benke Memorial Fund above the cost of the tablet, will be given to the widow and child of the dead organist.

Are You a Writer? Have You Talent or Ability?

One dollar may earn hundreds of thousands for you. I am not a mind reader nor a clairvoyant. I am an adviser, a reviewer and counsellor to such as have latent talent and don't know just how to apply it to advantage. I guarantee nothing. I do not wish to be overruled with unattractive, illiterate or other manuscripts fit only for the waste basket, but I do claim I can make name and fame and fortune for those who may possess ability, yet the inability to publish their work to the world. And the world is ever ready with open arms to welcome new genius. You may be a second KIPLING, BARRIE, CAME or ORRILL. If you are not, I will tell you the truth, and have you no expenditure of any matter. Questions and Answers

Mrs. G. W., Lafayette, Ind. Why are not old, worn-out ministers, who preach to save souls and so save the world, pensioned by the government, as well as men who fought for their country? God's cause should be honored as well as man's. We should not leave them and their families to suffer.

We trust that the time will yet come when the worn-out workers in the vineyard will be provided for, not by the government, but by the liberality of God's grateful people. Some few denominations provide for their aged preachers, but the neglect, in others, is so widespread and so evident that it is a reproach upon our so-called Christianity.

Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. Was Stephen's statement (Acts 7: 16) correct, that Abraham bought the sepulchre in which Jacob was subsequently buried, from the sons of Emmor?

No, either he made a mistake in quoting from memory, or is incorrectly reported. The cave of Machpelah in which Jacob was buried (see Gen. 50: 13) was bought by Abraham from Ephron, the Hittite (see Gen. 23: 17). The field that was bought from the sons of Hamor was bought by Jacob (see Gen. 33: 19). It was Joseph who was buried there (see Joshua 24: 32).

W. D., Des Moines, Ia. Would it not be practicable for those who possess only small means, yet wishing to own a home, to purchase not an entire house, but a suite of rooms or a flat, as they might require?

We believe few owners would be found willing to sell part of a house, as there would

Wm. C. D., Hudson, N. Y. Is it true, as has been stated, that Henry Wilson, once Vice-President of the United States, was not entitled by birth to his name?

Henry Wilson was born Jeremiah Jones Colbath. The place of his birth was Farmington, N. H. He learned the trade of shoe-making and was mainly self-educated. When young Colbath became of age, he had his name changed by the legislature to Henry Wilson, by which name he was afterward known. After serving successively in the Massachusetts House of Representatives and State Senate, he was elected president of the latter. In 1855 he was elected to the United States Senate, serving there for three terms. In 1872 he was elected Vice-President on the ticket with Gen. Grant.

FRANCES E. WILLARD'S "Occupations for Women"

The Last and Greatest Work from the Pen of the Reformer Who did More to Elevate her Sex than any Woman who ever Lived

This exceedingly practical volume shows the tremendous strides already made by women, points out many new fields and opportunities for them, and shows what feminine persistency, push and energy can accomplish.

It is a book of 500 royal quarto pages, elegantly printed on heavy coated paper, with 100 illustrations. The size, when closed, is seven by nine inches, and it is bound in cloth, with an illuminated cover.

be a risk of the rest being unmarketable. The only way to accomplish what you suggest, would be for a company of small capitalists to unite in purchasing a property, and then divide it up in proportion to their individual interest and take titles accordingly. It would be a complicated affair, at best. One bad occupant might render the place undesirable, and it would be a difficult task to get rid of him.

I. M., Chillicothe, O. What are the seven deadly sins?

As defined by the early Church, they were pride, anger, envy, sloth, covetousness, lust and gluttony.

A Schoolgirl, Akron, O. What is the exact meaning of the word "repartee"? Will you kindly print a sample.

"Repartee" is a smart, ready and witty reply. A good illustration is found in the story told of Leonard Bacon, a widely-known theologian of years ago. Dr. Bacon was attending a conference in a New England city. Some statements which he made in his addresses were vehemently objected to by a member of the opposition. "Why!" said the remonstrant, "I never heard of such a thing in my life!" "Mr. Moderator," rejoined Bacon, calmly, "I cannot allow my opponent's ignorance, however vast, to offset my knowledge, however small."

ful indignities. In revenge, she planned and executed the murder of her father, although when put to the torture with her brother Giacomo, she claimed to be innocent. Both were put to death. Some writers declare that she was the victim of an evil plot and guiltless of the crime. The story, as it is handed down to us, is of very doubtful authenticity in many essentials.

Mrs. McL., Oswego, N. Y. What is meant by the term "sweat shop"? Does it signify a small, close, stuffy factory?

The sweating system is practiced by subcontractors, who undertake to do work (generally on men and boys' clothing) in their own houses, or small workshops, and then employ others to do the work, making a profit for themselves by the difference between the contract prices and the wages they pay their assistants.

Subscriber, Washington, D. C. What should a wife do, whose husband has during many years of married life, persistently and violently opposed her in doing any kind of religious work, also in going to church services and in educating their children as Christians? She has done very successful work for God in Sabbath School and other church work. She neglects no home duty, and is a devoted wife and mother.

There are, unfortunately, many similar cases. We have always contended that marriage confers no right on either party to wreck the spiritual life of the other, and that both are entitled to enjoy the faithful and reasonable performance of their religious

W., West Simsbury, Conn. Will you please tell me concerning the eucalyptus tree? Of what country is it a native? Is it true that one of the European governments has caused large numbers of these trees to be planted, on ac- count of their power to ward off malaria?

The eucalyptus is a tree of the order myr- ta, and is found in Australia, Japan and the Malay Peninsula. It is said by botanists to be good for drying up marshy soil, and its removing a cause of malaria. Its growth is very rapid. 1. It is not known, but there is a tradition ut it was Mark, the writer of the second pel, and the companion of Paul, Barnabas d Peter. 2. That if men were as earnest in nning the good will of the poor by helping em, as the steward was in winning the grate- ide of his Lord's debtors by his fraudulent angement, they would be gladdened on ering heaven by the welcome of people om they had relieved. 3. That people o are only half converted, who give up ain sins, but do not seek the presence of e indwelling Spirit, and really give themselves to Christ, are in danger of falling back into their old ways, and even into that more hardened condition which results from a partial acquaintance with divine things.

Reader, Peoria, Ill. What was the origin of the prejudice against the number thirteen? Is there any reason for it.

It is supposed to be associated with the fact that Christ and his twelve disciples sat down to supper on the night preceding the crucifix- ion. It is a silly superstition to pay any at- tention to the number. It is not more un- lucky than others.

H. W. L., Scranton, Pa. Does it ever occur that a person is entirely sanctified when he is re- generated?

We never heard of such a case. The work of sanctification is a process continuing gen- erally through life. There are periods when it advances more rapidly than at others. Some- times under earnest preaching, or through a severe trial, or in a season of communion with God, the soul is filled with the Holy Spirit, and there is a consciousness of a ma- terial advance, which is sometimes permanent as it is instantaneous, but with the majority of Christians sanctification is a slow process, the result of many prayers and much discipline.

Student, Mott Haven, N. Y. Why did the Egyp- tians worship the Scarabæus or beetle?

They found in it many mystical associa- tions with their religious and social ideas. Its depositing its eggs in the earth, from which its progeny arose, was supposed to typify the resurrection. One of its habits was supposed to typify the influence of the sun on the earth. The fact that they be- lieved all beetles to be of the same sex made it a type of the self-existent Deity. The number of its toes corresponded with the number of days in their month, and there were other emblematic associations with it. The stone figures of it, the under side being cov- ered with hieroglyphs, were used as talismans to ward off the effects of the evil eye and were symbolical of Isis.

Seamen's Christian Association

HE workers in the Seamen's Christian As- sociation Mission, in New York, have been greatly encouraged by the testimonies re- cently given at the meetings. One man who had pledged eight years ago, down in the old quarters of the Mission, said that he had kept it through the many temptations in- vent to his hard life on a troopship running from Liverpool to Cape Ann. "But," said "God has helped me to be strong, and ur prayers have followed me, I know." An- other said: "I do not need to sign the tem- perance pledge, because I never touch the iff," and here came the real Christian-test, thought of others; "but perhaps, by sign- g, I may help some other poor fellow."

There was a world of pathos, and a long cry of struggle against his besetting sin, in a few words spoken by a middle-aged man, o said, "My missus was so glad when I ok your temperance card home to her, and t it up in the picture frame over our man- shelf, where we could all see it, and now want to take another so that she may know ave been faithful to my promise." Another came forward, saying, "I cannot te my name, but will you please sign the d for me?" A little girl writes, "We are happy in our home now that papa is a better man, and does not drink any more;" and a mother prays for a blessing on the Mission that has done so much for her boy.

Other and similar testimonies are an assur- ance that the efforts of the Seamen's Chris- tian Mission at 399 West Street, New York, is not in vain among the seafaring men. Many have been encouraged to try and lead better lives, have found the better way, and are happy in the finding. The life of a sailor is a hard one at best, so that the work ac- complished by this Mission during the seventeen years of its existence has brought many an encouragement and blessing to poor "Jack Tar."

The Gospel meetings have been well at- tended during the summer, and the reading- room has always been crowded. The secre- tary writes that every detail of the work is encouraging, and that THE CHRISTIAN HER- ALD has been most helpful with its sympathy and interest. She says, "We need to enlarge our borders, in order that we may not only continue, but increase our usefulness." Con- tributions to the good work will be gratefully acknowledged by the Secretary, Seamen's Christian Association, 399 West Street, New York.

Hans, the Wonderful Horse

IN a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a brief account of the remarkable horse, "Hans," whose ability as an arithmetician are astonishing the German scientists. Dr. O. Heinroth, of the Berlin Zoological Gardens, contributes a very interesting article on the subject to the Berlin Illustrirte Zeitung. He writes:

There is in Berlin, a gentleman who has tried for many years to prove the intelligence of the horse. Suddenly, one day, there appeared in one of the daily papers, an article that a horse not only understood the German language perfectly, but could do common addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. Not enough with that; it knows how to use fractions and decimals, and can distinguish colors, persons and photographs. This story left our Chief Director Dr. Heck, and the well-known African traveler, Dr. Schillings, and myself, no rest until we had seen the horse, for we were doubting Thomases.

Hans is a magnificent horse, of Russian blood, probably eight years old, and with a good-natured face. The owner, Mr. Osten, is an elderly gentleman, who was formerly a teacher of mathematics. For many years he tried to demonstrate the intelligence of the horse. One horse had made great advances after eight years of training, but the horse Hans had only been learning two years. Mr. Osten has no intention of selling Hans, nor of showing him for money. He says he simply teaches the animal for the love of science.

In the yard Mr. Osten showed us Hans, and asked the horse to do a few sums in addition, as 6 plus 2, 4 plus 3, etc., which the animal answered correctly by stamping the right forefoot. The horse continually puts his mouth into Mr. Osten's pocket to eat small pieces of carrot. This is done to get the horse to work, because the whip is unknown to him. He only answers questions after getting something to eat. "Without feeding, his mind is nothing," says Mr. Osten, smiling, "and what man receives through title, order, and position, Hans receives from the carrots."

We asked: "How is 12 divisible?" This was answered immediately. Additions like 72 plus 14 were also rightly answered. We now let Hans give us the figures 8 and 6, but we were yet more astonished when, by our wish, he gave 1-3, 3-4, etc. in decimals. He distinguished both genuine and unguine fractions. They held a watch before him, and he could distinguish the minute and the hour. And more yet: When, for instance, you said to him, "It is now 12 o'clock and 17 minutes, how many minutes are required to make it one-quarter to one?" He answered by 28 stamps. These are only a few examples.

Hans distinguishes gold and silver, by stamping, and can tell the difference between a fifty and a ten-pfennig piece. You write a concert programme on a slate, and by playing the melody of a number, he gives the number that corresponds. He even gave the octave on a mouth harmonica, according to the number. On the sand in the yard, we laid down half a dozen colored rags: white (1), black (2), red (3), blue (4), green (5), yellow (6). "Which is the green?" Five hoof stamps. "Go and get the green," and willingly Hans gets the rag. Doubters secretly change the colors, but that has no effect. We can write the questions on a slate just as well, without saying a word, and he answers them.

Hans counts differently with the low numbers than with the high. For 4, for instance, the hoof-stamps follow slowly, for 54 quickly, then towards the end slower, as if the animal were thinking. Sometimes he is very stubborn. He does not want to answer and then he must be threatened with. "You will get nothing to eat." This is the only punishment he dreads.

The small yard is always filled with inquisitive and earnestly interested people. We stand about 20 men and women in a row and ask Hans "Which is the largest, the most corpulent, how many officers, ladies, boys, children, etc." In the background hang ten differently colored rags on a wash-line, and Hans tells the officers' colors.

"HANS" AND HIS OWNER, MR. OSTEN

Hans was not picked out of any special number of horses. Mr. Osten thinks that you can teach any horse similar tricks. If all this is true, it is only dressur (training). Hans even knows the days and dates as well as a school-boy, without the help of a calendar.

To this almost incredible story of the intelligent horse, the editor of Illustrirte Zeitung adds the following:

Authorities of zoology, including Prof. Dr. Mobius, Director of Zoological Museums in Berlin, Dr. Heck, Director of the Berlin Zoological Gardens, and the well-known African traveler Schillings, have declared that the horse answered these questions through its mind. People who know horses and others may doubt this. We, too, have our doubts, and leave it to the author of the article (Dr. Heinroth).

[There is no doubt whatever among American horse-men on the subject of which Dr. Heinroth writes. Any good horse, they say, can be taught surprising tricks, including the apparent counting of figures, etc. Results are reached, not by any mental calculation, but by the docility of the animal in responding to signals from its master or trainer.]

SPEAKING TO THE CAPTAIN

By REV. HENRY BURTON, M.A., ENGLAND

On many ferry-boats is the notice: "Passengers are requested not to speak to the captain or steersman while crossing the river."

THERE is a stream that we all must cross,
The River of human Years;
Now lying calm in the summer light,
Now splashed with a rain of tears.
Out from the hills of God it flows,
And on to the shoreless sea.
Where the noontide sun no shadow throws,
And time is eternity.

REFRAIN: But why should I faint or falter?
Why are these doubts and fears?
I shall go and speak to the Captain
As I cross the River of Years.

There is a stream that we often cross,
The River of earthly change;
As we leave the moorings of the past,
And we seek the new and strange.
But the shore is veiled by a misty cloud,
And we cannot see it well.
And the voices of the storm are loud,
As we hear the minute bell.

There is a stream that we all must cross,
The River of Death so cold;
When the lights of earth are seen no more,
And the green moss turns to mold;
When a hand of ice shall push our bark
Out on the swelling tide,
When friends will leave us alone in the dark,
Alone on the waters wide.

Say, have you made friends with the Captain?
Have you looked in His loving face?
Have you heard His voice of pardon?
Have you tasted of His grace?
O, why do you slight and grieve Him,
Counting His love but loss?
Will you sin on, and leave Him,
When the River of Death you cross?

REFRAIN: O, speak, speak now to the Captain,
Speak in your sighs and tears!

Don't do this drudgery

Carrying coal and ashes up and down stairs is needless, wearing work. Why do it? Why shiver and freeze through another winter with crude heating methods? Why continue to pay extra for the dirt, drudgery and fuel waste of the old-fashioned ways? Put in Steam or Water warming—now so simple, like telephoning the cellar for heat—and enjoy all the comforts and healthfulness of our way.

AMERICAN & IDEAL RADIATORS & BOILERS

Introduced into homes or buildings is an investment capital in lasting property. They cannot rust or wear out—they outlast the building. They enable the whole investment to command larger rental, if the owner becomes a landlord. They enable the owner to secure a high price on the whole property, if offered for sale. They offer the only way to convert the money thus spent into a profitable investment, also to secure largest heat comfort.

Simple to put into OLD buildings—cottages to 90-room buildings—without disturbance to building or occupant. State kind and size of building you wish to heat. Valuable information and booklet (free).

The Hebrews' Harvest Festival

Succoth, or the Feast of Tabernacles, now Celebrated throughout the World

ON Saturday, September 24, began the celebration of Succoth, the ancient Jewish Feast of Tabernacles, which followed closely after the great Hebrew holidays, Rosh Hakanah (the New Year), on September 1, and Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), on September 19. In The New York Times, Dr. Isidor Singer, one of the most learned Hebrews in America, contributes a scholarly article of unusual interest on Succoth. He writes:

"This festival was in Biblical times, or, more exactly, as long as our ancestors lived as an independent nation on the soil of Palestine, instituted as a celebration of the ingathering of the fruits of the year, concluding the year of the three great annual feasts—the four two being Passover and Pentecost. The great autumn Thanksgiving was held as soon as the corn and wine, and the other fruits of the soil were safely under roof on the thousands of little farms of our agricultural forefathers. This event took place, of course, at different dates in different years, and in different districts. Thus we know that the feast of ingathering, Chag ha-Assif (this was the original name of the festival), was of old celebrated in the hill country around Jerusalem, not in the seventh, but in the eighth month. Like the other harvest feast, Chag ha-Assif was intimately connected with the conquest of Canaan, and was probably of Canaanitic origin. We find a short account of the harvest festival of the pagan population of the land, in Judges 9: 27: 'And they went into the fields and gathered their vineyards and trod (the grapes), and made merry, as went into the house of their god and did and drank.' At the time of the author of Exodus 23: 39-43, the Feast of Tabernacles was no longer the natural festival conclusion of the harvest, but an official solemnity, with a fixed ceremonial, and the Exodus from Egypt as an historic background.

It is evident that the living in booths and the designations of 'Feast of Tabernacles,' or 'Feast of Booths,' originated in the simple fact that during the olive and grape harvest the harvesters spent their days and nights in booths, this practice being still in use in Palestine. Volumes have been written about the reason to which the boughs of the various trees and the willows of the brook were originally destined. But however repugnant to thought may be to the pious Jew of Warsaw, Prague, or New York, going in procession, lulab and ethrog in hand, around the reading desk, we must not reject off-hand the theory of modern Bible critics, who see in the old and beautiful ceremony an analogy with some of the old Hellenic festivals and compare the lulab with the thyrsos.

After the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, at the final extinction of the national life of the ancestors on their own soil, rabbinical customs stepped in to lay down fixed rules for the ceremonial, which is still observed by the conservative co-religionists in all parts of the globe. According to these rules, the sukkah must be a detached and temporary habitation, specially constructed for the purpose. The maximum of its height ought to be twenty cubits, the minimum ten palms. No more than three walls are allowed. The booth must be completely roofed in or covered with solid material, but in such a way as to admit the view of the sky. It should not be under a tree (an old souvenir, probably, of the Mosaic prohibition of the pagan tree-worship), neither be covered with a cloth nor with anything which contracts defilement, or does not grow in the soil. The furniture must be very simple (Misnah, Sukkah, I, 1-2, 7). Only during a heavy rainstorm is one allowed to quit the booth; even little children, as soon as they cease to be dependent upon their mother, must dwell in the sukkah; only women and invalids are exempt from this duty.

As to the lulab (i. e., the festive palm-branch) its three constituents are: (1) A shoot of the palm-tree in its folded state before the leaves are spread out, and at least three mid-branches long; it is bound round with a twig or tendril of its own kind, (2) three twigs of myrtle; (3) two willow branches, all twigs of branches being tied to the lower end of the palm branch, the myrtle twigs on the right and the willow branch to the left, by means of three rings of palm strips. The ethrog is the fruit of a tree of the lemon family, oblong in shape, with a hard and fragrant skin, a white and subacid pulp. It is possible that the Jews brought the tree with them from Babylonia on their return from the exile. Jewish folk-lore soon took of the holy fruit. In Genesis, Rabiah 15: 7, the ethrog among other fruits, suggested as having been the forbidden fruit of the Garden of Eden. The ethrog must not have a stain on the crown nor be without the crown, peeled of its rind, perforated or defective in any way. The lulab was waved in the Second Temple during the recitation of the thanksgiving prayer. After the destruction of the Temple,

R. Johanan ben Zakkai ordained that the practice should be observed everywhere during the seven days 'in remembrance of the Temple.' This ceremony is observed in the modern synagogues (except on Sabbath). The mode of carrying and waving the lulab and ethrog is to-day nearly the same as it was in the Temple. The ceremony is binding upon every devout Jew. One should not break his fast before carrying it out. In countries where, owing to the cost, not every household can afford a lulab and an ethrog, the poor are allowed to use those belonging to their wealthier brethren. Usually the congregation owns a lulab and an ethrog, which are carried from house to house, so that the children and the feeble persons who cannot come to the synagogue, may observe the commandment and be allowed to break their fast in due time.

In olden times the joyousness of the Feast of Booths attained its height on the 21st day of Tishri. In our day, the exceedingly pious people meet after the evening service and the festival meal are over, in social gathering, to read in common Deuteronomy, the Book of Psalms, and passages from the Zohar and other cabalistic writings, taking in the intervals copious refreshments. In some places (Amsterdam, England, America) the Shofar is sounded during the procession at the morning service. Then the lulab is laid aside, and the whole community, each one taking up a small bunch of willows, joins in the hymn: Kol mebaser ue-omer ('A voice brings news and says') expressing thus their Messianic hopes.

'The Feast of Booths,' although originally an agricultural feast and, therefore, deeply rooted in the Palestinian soil, has been preserved in most of its characteristics by the Diaspora, excepting, of course, the local ordinances and those pertaining to the sacrificial service. Like his ancestors in the land of Israel, the Orthodox Jew of to-day begins, immediately after the Day of Atonement, with joy in his heart, the preparations for the construction of the sukkah. The children run into the woods to collect foliage and wild-flowers, and the mother opens her purse to buy what the gardener can offer for the beautifying of the booth, which is erected either in the narrow yard or in one of the attics. But gay as these green oases in the dark ghetto streets look, they cannot compare with the gay and striking spectacle which Jerusalem must have presented during the great thanksgiving festival: the joyful crowd, feasting in their huts by day, and parading with lamps and flambeaux in the streets of the Holy City and its suburbs at night. We understand, therefore, the old Hebrew proverb: 'He who has never seen the rejoicing at the pouring out of the water of Siloam has never seen rejoicing in his life.'

A Favorite Japanese Game

A favorite game of the Japanese is played as follows: One hundred well-known proverbs are selected, each divided into two parts and each part printed on a separate card. The host of the evening has the hundred first halves, which he reads aloud, one by one; the hundred second halves are dealt to the other players, who place their hands face upward on the 'tatami,' or thick mat of rice straw on which they sit. As the first half of any proverb is read the holder of the second half throws it out, or if he sees it unnoticed among his neighbor's cards seizes it and gives him one of his own. The player who is first 'out' wins. It is a very simple game, but it affords great entertainment to the players, for the quicksighted and keen witted are constantly seizing the cards of their duller and slower neighbors, and this leads to much laughter and many good-natured sarcasms.

Helping One Another*

OUR influence on one another is unavoidable. Everyone is doing something, for good or ill, for the people with whom he comes in contact. He may be unconscious of the effect of his life, but there is sure to be someone near him who knows what that life is, and is affected by it. A rich man living a life of idle luxury, may boast that he wrongs no man, and is simply doing as he pleases with his own; but who can tell what effect the spectacle of that indolent, pleasure-loving existence may be having on men, whose struggle for existence is wearing them to death? Who can tell how many young men are influenced against religion by seeing some man of blameless life holding aloof from the Church? On the other hand, how many may be encouraged to bear the burdens of life bravely and cheerfully, by seeing some afflicted creature patiently enduring suffering? Mere example, without intentional effort is a help or a hindrance in the world. It is that fact that makes life so solemn a thing, and so vastly increases responsibility.

But beyond all this, there is the duty of direct and intentional help. We see a case of distress, and lament that our social system provides no resource for its relief. It is surely the duty of someone to succor the sufferer. To how many does the thought come that the duty is personal, and that by practicing a little self-denial, the luxury of doing a service might be enjoyed? Or, it may be, that the need might be supplied without expenditure. To help a perplexed man think out his problem, and to aid him in finding a solution, may be a form of help more valuable than a gift of money. To take the trouble to find occupation for an unemployed man, to say a word of counsel to some boy just beginning to drift into evil, to give a word of encouragement to a man whose clouded brow shows the distress of his mind, to speak a word of sympathy to the mourner—who can estimate the value of such a service?

It has been practically proved in our Social Settlements, that there are better ways of brightening dark lives and lifting burdens from weary shoulders than the giving of alms. Living in the crowded streets of a great city, men and women of education, culture and refinement are able to learn, by association with the people around them, what are the difficulties that are hard to overcome, and can help them in their effort. They can afford them the opportunity to substitute elevating amusements for the coarse and degrading indulgences which are provided for them by the saloon and the low theatre. They can stand between them and the people who would tempt them to evil, and those who would take advantage of their poverty and ignorance to wrong them. Such help is most valuable, and those who render it are worthy of all honor. Similarly, the Boys' clubs do excellent preventive work, by providing boys a better place of recreation than the street, and encouraging them to lead clean and virtuous lives. The Institutional Church is also engaged in work of a similar kind, and has benefited the community wherever it has been established.

Work of this kind may be done by individuals as well as by institutions. The true character of the Christian is that of a helpful man. He ought to be known as a man who is ready to sympathize and to help in every trial, not necessarily with money but with personal service. The time is yet to come when the full force of our Lord's Parable of the Good Samaritan is realized by every one who bears the name of "Christian." "Go thou and do likewise" is a command, not a mere matter of advice. Paul speaks of it as a law, when he says that we are to bear one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ.

Tent Work in Brooklyn

THREE years ago, the Rev. Dr. Charles T. Baylis came from Cincinnati to Brooklyn, to take pastoral charge of the Bushwick Avenue Congregational Church. This summer he declined all invitations during the vacation period, in order that he might engage in tent work. With the aid of friends, a tent, capable of seating one thousand persons, was pitched upon the circus grounds. Here Dr. Baylis has held services every evening, except Saturday, and three times on the Lord's day, accomplishing a large amount of good. Some striking incidents are recorded, showing the spiritual results of the work. A leaflet was blown from the pulpit, and fell at the feet of one who was standing outside the tent; he placed it in his pocket and forgot it. In his place of business it came to his mind; he read the little slip, and was about to cast it away. But he kept it instead, and it became the means of his conversion. He returned to the tent, and publicly confessed Christ as his Saviour.

A young man had gone astray, and spent his substance in riotous living. On Saturday night, Aug. 27, he was arrested for drunkenness, and spent the night in the station house. Wandering along the street next day, aimless and unhappy, he heard the singing in the tent; he went in, was led to reflection upon his former sober and happy days, and determined by the help of God to amend his life. He was again present in the evening, and confessed the error of his ways, and begged the prayers of the congregation in his behalf. The workers have no question as to the genuineness of this young wanderer's reformation.

A professional bartender, during an interval of business, happened by the tent. He, like others, was attracted by the music, and timidly came in, and hid himself among the crowd. The discourse was on the relation of man to his fellow-man, and to God. The bartender, at the close of the service, sought an interview with some of the workers, and had a talk with Dr. Baylis, which resulted in the giving up of his evil business. From that moment he has devoted himself, joyfully, and with unremitting diligence, to the work of bringing others to Christ.

It is the intention to prolong these ministrations as late as the weather will permit, at least to some extent. Surf Evangelist Bradford Williams, Police Evangelist Herbert Lowe, and representatives of the Jerry M'Auley's Mission, have participated in this work. It is proposed next year, to have a tent capable of accommodating three thousand persons.

"Blessed are the Peacemakers"

DURING the recent meeting of the Inter-Parliamentary Conference in St. Louis, Count Goblet d'Alviella, of Belgium, brought up the Russo-Japanese War. He introduced the following resolution;

The Inter-Parliamentary Peace Conference, shocked by the horrors of the war that is being waged in the Far East between two civilized States, and deploring that the powers signatory of the convention of The Hague have been unable to have recourse to the clauses thereof, which direct them to tender their mediation immediately upon the outbreak of hostilities, asks the powers signatory of the convention of The Hague to intervene at the proper time with the belligerents in order to facilitate the restoration of peace, and instructs the Inter-Parliamentary Bureau to bring the present resolutions to the knowledge of the said powers,

An amendment was adopted substituting the word "immediately" for "at the proper time," and authorizing the powers to proffer their peaceful offices to Japan and Russia individually and collectively. The original motion as amended was then adopted unanimously.

Congressman Burton, of Ohio, then introduced a resolution, prepared by Senator Bartholdt, asking President Roosevelt to call an international meeting similar to The Hague tribunal, delegates to which shall be empowered to act for their respective governments in the signature of peace treaties, in the hope that a congress of nations may be established. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

HOSTESS TO A PROPHET

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

IN the biographies contained in the Word of God, those things are told in the lives of his servants which bring to light especially how he uses them in manifesting his glory, and also in their bringing others in contact with him. Elisha's service to the widow was as important in God's sight as his ministry on Carmel. It was needed that he who would turn the heart of the people back to him should be known as the God of the resurrection. When the apostle Paul prays that great prayer in Eph. 1, and intercedes with God for a spirit of revelation in the knowledge of him for them to whom he writes, he, when speaking of the exceeding greatness of God's power, at once alludes to the resurrection as the proof, above all others, of that working of the strength of his might which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead (Eph. 1: 17-20). If God's power is not manifest in our home life, if souls are not touched by what they see and feel of God in our ordinary life, any public testimony which we may give is powerless.

Elisha seems to have had a ministry, probably to the sons of the prophets, as well as to other people, which caused him to be frequently moving here and there. And it fell on a day that Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman. It was in earthly possessions that the woman of Shunem was great. Greatness in the kingdom of heaven is of quite another order; a little child is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. This woman constrained the prophet to eat bread; and he made her house his stopping-place whenever he came that way. It is no light privilege, and no light responsibility, to entertain a messenger of God who is specially on his Master's business. There are people who are always more than ready to take in some very prominent speaker, they like to have it to tell that such an one has stayed at their house. But there are some houses where a true man of God never cares to stay a second time. The atmosphere of prayer is not in the house, and his environment weakens him for his ministry, or, on the other hand, there may be a constant call upon him to give out more than he has received of the Lord, and no respect for the time he must take to commune with God, if he is a true messenger. This woman had an eye which saw things in God's light. She did not note the social position, the talents or the education of Elisha; in her eyes his holiness was his striking characteristic.

The woman of Shunem understood her guest and entered into his ministry, no doubt, with much prayer. Instinctively she felt that a man who had to bear God's messages to others needed to be much alone, and so to be separated from the noise and stir of the household. So she said to her husband, "Behold, now I perceive that this is a holy man of God which passeth by us continually. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick; and it shall be when he cometh to us that he shall turn in thither." It was no luxurious furniture, but it was just enough. Martha burdened her holy Guest with much serving. Had this woman entertained Jesus she would not have made the same mistake. How many there are who, in entertaining God's people, think more of what will reflect credit on themselves than of that which will be really helpful to a man of God! Of all things, a true messenger of God wants a place and time to be alone. This is more to him than luxurious furniture or food. A true messenger of God does not want to be lionized or to meet great people, but not to be hindered in meeting God.

The chamber was built, furnished and occupied. How little did this woman know when she set it at Elisha's disposal how God was going to manifest his glory just in that very chamber!

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

M. B. H., Los Angeles, Calif. Did the witch of Endor really raise Samuel from the dead?

There is no evidence of the fact and no reason for believing it. Josephus describes her as a common fortune-teller, who imposed on the king. It must be remembered that Saul did not see the prophet, but trusted to the necromancer's description of the man she professed to see. The conversation between Saul and Samuel was probably conducted by the woman, as in the case of the modern mediums. It may have been that God vouchsafed to Saul a real revelation. Such reproaches as Samuel is reported as uttering were not such as the woman was likely to have invented.

Subscriber, Silver Springs, N. Y. Could a man, for good reasons, appoint some one to take charge of his property and financial affairs, sign his checks, etc.? What would such a person be called?

He could appoint another as his personal representative or attorney, with full power to do these things, under a regular Power of Attorney, prepared by a lawyer and duly recorded. It is a very risky experiment, and should never be done without the fullest consideration, and the very strongest reasons.

J. L., New Orleans, La. 1. Is Charles Wagner, the famous pastor, a native of France or Germany? 2. What is the special feature of his preaching?

1. He is an Alsatian, and was born in 1852, long before that province was ceded by France to Germany. His father was a poor country pastor. 2. He preaches a very plain, practical doctrine, which is fully set forth in his book, The Simple Life (McClure, Phillips & Co., New York). His style is earnest, deeply spiritual, and orthodox in every essential, and is a plea for a return to simple and unostentatious Christianity, and a method of life less worldly and more in harmony with the Divine purpose.

D. V., Houstonia, Mo., and others. What is the unpardonable sin spoken of in Matt. 12:32? Can it be committed now?

This question has been answered in this department several times, but for the sake of new subscribers, several of whom have written asking it lately, we repeat the answer given before. The context shows that Jesus was dealing with a peculiarly heinous suggestion. It was that he was in league with Satan, and that it was by satanic power that he worked his miracles. We infer from his reply that he regarded the charge as an evidence of extreme wickedness and an insult to the Holy Spirit. He declared it unpardonable. Other explanations are given, but this seems to us most probable. Theologians are divided on the question whether it can be committed in our day. Those persons, however, who ridicule the work of the Spirit in revivals, and in conversions generally, come perilously near to the sin.

Wm. B., Patchogue, N. Y. What is the meaning of "Dalai Lama," as applied to the ruler of Tibet?

"Dalai Lama" means "great mother of souls," indicating the spiritual headship of the wearer of the title.

Reader, Michigan. Some time since, you gave an answer in regard to the Biblical ground for divorce, which interested me, and I have a peculiar case in mind which I would like to submit for your candid opinion: A man (Mr. A.), married a woman in good faith, believing her a widow; but after a few months he discovered that she had a husband whom she represented as her brother. Mr. A. did not seek a divorce, simply because he found out that she was not the legal wife of the other "husband" (who was proved to be a bigamist), thus making Mr. A. her legal husband, although he had been the victim of a shameful fraud. Under such conditions do you not think A. would be justified in divorcing himself from the woman, and, if he chose, remarrying, without violating the spirit of God's law?

Counselor G. H. Crawford, to whom this question was submitted, answers as follows: "Deciding this question merely from the standpoint of human law, I should recommend, not a strict divorce, which assumes the entire validity of the marriage, but an action to have the marriage declared void on the ground of fraud. Such an action is, in some States, called an action of 'divorce';

but the intrinsic distinction is a sound one. A marriage procured by fraud, is, in law, no marriage at all, and if the fraud is proved, the court will so declare. It would not be safe for the man interested to assume that the marriage was void, without obtaining a decree from a competent court."

L. E. D., Hoboken, N. J. Who was Thomas à Kempis? For what is he famous?

He was a man of singularly beautiful character and eminent piety. He was born about the year 1380, at Kempen, near Cologne, Germany. His real name was Thomas Hamerken. Kempis refers to his birthplace. In early youth he joined a monastic brotherhood known as the Brethren of the Common Life. He wrote many books, the chief of which was the Imitation of Christ, a work of which more copies have been sold than of almost any other volume.

L. B. H., Ames, Ia. What is the Peace Arbitration Court, or should it be called the Court of Arbitration? Does it meet in the United States, or is it the same as the Hague Tribunal?

W. P., Jersey City, N. J. Is it true that we should usually sleep on the right side?

Some eminent physicians and authorities on hygiene, hold that sleeping on the left side impedes the action of the heart and lungs, and that sleep is troubled and unrefreshing in consequence.

J. L., Sebec Station, Me. In my Sunday School class, the question was asked. Who was the last King of Babylon? Some gave it as Belshazzar, others as Nabonidus. Please answer through your paper which is right, and why the contradiction?

Cyrus, the Persian, took the city in 538 B.C., in the reign of Nabonidus, last monarch of the Babylonian dynasty. Associated with Nabonidus in the government of the kingdom was his son, Belshazzar, or Bel-shar-ezer, who is shown by the inscriptions to have been a co-ruler with his father, and to have enjoyed royal honors. On the approach of Cyrus' army, Nabonidus took the field in person and is not to be regarded as in any sense a portion of the Sacred Book itself, but simply as a series of calculations by a learned theologian. Nobody knows the age of the earth, and consequently the date of the Creation must still be read as "In the beginning," according to the Bible itself. Scientific calculations as to the beginnings of things, horses included, are mere speculation.

H. W. G., Ackley, Pa. 1. What is the religion of Japan? 2. Is it necessary for a man to be a lawyer or to practice law, before he can be President of the United States?

1. There are various religions in Japan, the principal being Shintoism (the State religion) and Buddhism. The Ainus in the North are fetich-worshippers. 2. Not at all. Washington, Jackson, Taylor, Grant were exceptions. Other things being equal, however, it is very desirable that the Chief Executive should be well versed in the law.

L. P., Glen Moore, Pa. As you now state it, it has the appearance of a scheme to defraud creditors. Not knowing all the facts, however, we cannot advise. Consult a lawyer.

Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., the President's eldest son, has gone into what is known as the Lake St. John country, near Quebec, to spend a short season in fishing and hunting. This is one of the wildest and most picturesque regions of the North, and it is so little known to the tourist that it is visited by comparatively few travelers. Its chain of lakes and streams is full of trout and other game fish, while in the extensive forests are to be seen not only the ordinary deer, but at times the famous caribou. Several of the principal lakes are connected by rivers which are navigable for canoes, and this is one of the most popular methods of travel.

THE STRANGEST of ROYAL WEDDINGS

How a Sultan of Siam Celebrated in a Single Jubilee the Marriages of his Five Sons

A QUINTUPLE marriage ceremony, which took sixty days to perform, was recently celebrated in Kedah, a southern province of Siam. Sixty days of strange and unique ceremonials, made five sons of the Sultan of Kedah the happy husbands of five little Siamese brides.

There are thirty thousand people who claim Kedah as their home and country, and the population is swelled by many foreigners from various other lands; and as these weddings took the form of a national jubilee, in which every one took part, either as participant or spectator, this marriage festival can be rated as one of the greatest of modern times.

The preliminaries occupied months, and every one who could possibly do so, saw the show.

Each ceremony occupied twelve days, excepting that of the Crown Prince, to which one or two extra days were given. The King of Siam, not being able to come himself, sent his son, Prince Chulalongkorn, who came overland from the eastern side of the peninsula, with his suite, in great grandeur, on the backs of elephants.

His Highness, Lunkau Ibrahim, the Crown Prince, married his first daughter, daughter of His Highness, the Rajah Mudi of Kedah. At 1 o'clock P.M., on the first day of each marriage, prayers were said for bride and bridegroom, who had not met as yet. At 4 P.M., a wedding ceremony was performed in public after the Mohammedan custom; after which a banquet was served to everyone, the European and high-class native, however, coming in for the most attention. The tables were spread in the court-house, and very beautifully decorated. Four long tables were laid for the royal house of Kedah and their European friends, the tremely fond. On the evening of the tenth day, the bride and groom meet for the first time. On the eleventh and twelfth, there are more rounds of gayety. The thirteenth and last day, marks a quaint and curious ceremony, called the "lime bath." A beautiful pavilion is erected, surrounded by high brick walls, the gates of which are locked after the arrival of the participants and spectators until the ceremony is over. The bride is carried in, the groom walks, supported by his two best men. The chief participants are dressed in magnificent robes of silk, garnished with much gold, and sparkling with diamonds and other brilliant gems. The bridal pair seat themselves upon a sort of golden throne, reached by a flight of steps, around which two old Malay women walk, first on the highest step, then down gradually to the lowest, when they disappear. Then two other women enclose the couple within curtains, where they remove the gorgeous bridal robes and are there arrayed in lighter garments.

The curtains are pulled open, at which moment a torrent of water belches forth from immense serpents, which are reared on each side of the throne, and the royal couple are drenched to the skin. Then, to the astonishment and consternation of the spectators, the natives seize buckets, fill them with scented water from huge tubs and proceed to drench everyone within the enclosure; there is no escaping the bath, as the gates are securely locked, and the men with the buckets are no respecters of persons.

This indiscriminate assault by the water-bearers continues until every drop of water is gone, and every dress ruined, to the discomfiture of many visiting European ladies, who waste no time when the gates are unlocked in changing their water-soaked garments for dry, and thus ends the strangely unique Siamese wedding ceremonies attendant upon the marriage of the Princes of the Province of Kedah. The other four weddings, which followed in rapid succession, were practically a repetition of the first event as to ceremonial forms and festivities.

Malay officers being entertained in an adjoining room. Two refreshment bars were open day and night, where food and drink were furnished free to all. Many temporary buildings were erected, as well as open-air stages for various performances, ceremonials, and sports, in which fireworks played a conspicuous part. These ceremonies occupied several days. Malays, Siamese, Hindus, Chinese, and Mohammedans, each had a separate stage. Shooting parties were organized for the Europeans by the Sultan's brother, the Rajah of Mudi.

On the eighth day, a magnificent procession was formed, which marched around the town. In this procession were many quaint and curious things—big boxes in the shape of birds, while the people of importance were also carried about on thrones, to add to the grandeur and importance of the scene. This lasted one hour, then followed the picking of enai, by persons delegated for this task. They marched seven times around a beautiful garden of flowers, each picking a handful of leaves, great personages being allowed to pick a double quantity—all they could gather in two hands. These leaves were subsequently sprinkled over bride and groom separately, each one receiving at the same time a "good talking to."

An Age of Iconoclasm

TEXT—Psalms 11:3.
"If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

EMASCULATING, depressing, and benumbing, is the maxim propagated by some lazy, non-progressive people, as the rule of thought and life, that, "What was good enough for our fathers should be good enough for us." I would yield to no man in my reverence for the memory of the sainted dead, whose sacred dust lies in our cemeteries. No flowers are there too fragrant for the family plots; no epitaphs too eloquent or too reverent to recount their virtues; nor, when the family finances are adequate, any mausoleum too imposing to enshrine their remains. I have always found out when investigating, that, if a son does not respect the memory of a dead mother, he will not respect the living wife.

We should hold sacred the dust of our dead. That is true. But we should never build the hillock of the grave so high that it will dam back the onward flow of the "Waters of Knowledge," and change the "River of Progress" into the "Stagnant Pool of Ignorance and Sloth." When the past generations did their work, they did it well for the time and the conditions in which they lived. But the dead generations would not do as they did in the past, if they were living now. We would not cry "Halt" to the "Forward March" of scientific investigation: neither would we compel the Church of the Lord Jesus Christ to "Mark Time" by the grave of a Justin Martyr, a Calvin, a Wesley, a Luther, a Knox, or bivouac with eternal somnolence in the chambers of a Westminster Abbey, where the honored ecclesiastical fathers gathered July 1, 1643, and composed the Presbyterian "Confession of Faith."

Mischievous Innovators

But though we would not consider our ancestors infallible in their opinions nor absolutely wise in their ways of living, yet on the other hand, we must grant that our ancestors knew a great deal more than some of us are willing to give them credit for. Though our forefathers' "Lightning Expresses" were only canal boats and stage coaches and sailing boats, in which most of us would be afraid to cross Long Island Sound, let alone the Atlantic Ocean, that is no reason why they did not know how to develop Christian men and women as successfully as do we. Though our ancestors for the most part had no books save that of a Bible, a Pilgrim's Progress, or a Doddridge's Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, that is no proof that they did not know as much of God, and hold the truth in its purity as thoroughly as do we, who have access to such vast modern libraries, and yet to-day we find a spirit of "Exterminating Iconoclasm" abroad. Man's profane hands are digging up the old foundations, and destroying the old altars, and ridiculing the old ways, merely because they are old. I would not have you bend the knee before the hillock of an ancestral grave as though it were a shrine. But I would have you respect and not destroy it; but use that hillock of a grave as the stepping-stone to a higher throne. The living may in some things be right where their Christian ancestors were wrong. Yet we have only to look around at the modern innovations, and observe the effect they have on the community, to be convinced that in some things our Christian ancestors were right, and the modern innovators deplorably wrong.

In the first place, I protest against the iconoclasm which is undermining the foundation stones of our ancestral Sabbath. Its desecrators have been going up and down the length and the breadth of the land, asserting that religious worship can become as much a form of dissipation as drink, or overeating, or over-exercising can be. They make a wrong application of our Lord's words that the "Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath." They affirm that it is absurd for a business man, who has been at hard work for at least six days of the week, from seven o'clock in the morning sometimes until ten, or eleven, or twelve o'clock at night, to be compelled to get up on Sunday in time for an early Sunday School, then to attend two long church preaching services, and then, perhaps, to attend a Christian Endeavor Society besides.

The Desecrated Sabbath

They contend that Sunday should be a day of rest, and that what a man needs upon the Sabbath Day is relaxation. He should go to bed Saturday night after a hot bath with his mind perfectly at ease. As he crawls into bed he should be able to say to himself: "Now, I can lie here just as long as I please. If I awake at nine o'clock, all right. If I can sleep to twelve, better still. Then after I awake, I will have a cup of coffee and a roll brought to my bedside, and I will eat a little and then stay in bed for another hour, reading the newspaper. Then, after dinner, I will take my children out to one of the public parks or down by the seaside, and get a sun-bath and a view of God's trees and valleys and hillsides. Or, I will go to one of our great art galleries and look at the pictures. It is impossible for me to go and see the painters' and the sculptors' masterpieces on any other day. Therefore the city art galleries should be opened on Sunday. Then in the evening hour I will go to church if I feel like it. If I do not desire to do so, I will go to bed again and rest, rest, yes, just rest. By such a system of rest I shall be invigorated and shall return to my work the next Monday, strong in body, clear in mind, more loving to my family, the human race at large, and to God himself. That," says, our iconoclast, "is my idea of the Sabbath Day. I do not think a hard working-man has a right to make his Sunday a day of hard work in church-going, so that he works harder on the Sabbath than he does on any other day of the week."

An Old-Fashioned Sunday

Sabbatic iconoclast, is that the way you would have man spend his Sabbaths? Well, already your modern teaching in reference to the Sabbath too well has taken root. Your premises are wrong, for you know not to what conclusions they tend. To see whether your grandfather's Sabbath or your own is the better, I would have you compare the two, side by side. Thirty, fifty years ago, the man who made Sunday a day of pleasure, was looked upon as a blasphemer, an out and out enemy of God, of the Church and of the better elements of the social community. When Sunday morning would come, even the horses and the stock of the farm knew it was a day of rest. The family would arise a little later than usual. Then they would linger a little longer at the breakfast table. Then the sweetest music of the world would begin to sound. The old village bell would send its silvery notes rolling down the valley. Then, after morning prayers, the horses were hitched up, and father and mother and all the children rode to town in the same big wagon. Then the pew was a family pew, and all the members were there. Then came the sermon. Then the journey home. Then the quiet yet bountiful dinner. Then the afternoon for reading or restful quiet. Then the singing of the hymns around the old-fashioned piano. No Damrosch's orchestra or Theodore Thomas' stringed instruments ever had such enthusiastic audiences and participants as those old family oratorios about the piano, where our sisters played, and our fathers and mothers and the rest of the family all joined in the singing. Then the evening church service again, or, if the farm was too far away, the evening prayers and early bed. You know, oh, man, that old-fashioned Sabbath Day meant more than mere cessation from worldly work. It meant quiet communion with God. It meant Bible study and sacred readings as well as mere rest. Do you wonder that such a Sabbath as our fathers observed was the very foundation of Church life, of Christian home life, of Bible reading and of consecration to God?

Modern Observance

Alongside of this beautiful Sabbath Day of rest, I want you to place the modern Sabbath with its so-called liberal ideas. First, where do we find the vestibule of the Sabbath—namely Saturday night. To bed early. Oh no. Saturday night has come. In our large cities the street cars are crowded. Where are the people going? Some to the theatres. Others, alas, to places of still more evil resort. Men and women, tired from work now, are turning this Saturday night into the hardest kind of work. They are dissipating for pleasure's sake. To the non-church goer, as a rule, Saturday night is only too often a time for free indulgence of every desire that is bad.

Sunday morning is here. Where do we now find most of the non-church goers. Again crowding our railroad trains and cars. Picnics, ball games, outing parties, where the breweries and the wine sellers get their biggest revenues. The beautiful pictures of the family Bible which we used to study as a boy, have given place to the silly pictorials of the Sunday newspaper. Everywhere on the Sabbath sin simply runs riot. In many cities even the saloons and play-houses are full. Instead of the quiet family group going to the village church, now almost every country road near an adjacent city has its yelling rioters, half drunk or entirely debauched, who are off for a day of sin. Do you mean to tell me, sensible man, that the modern way of spending the Sabbath is as profitable, as a day of rest and communion with God, as were the Sabbath Days our forefathers observed?

The rigid observance of God's day as a day consecrated to himself, is the most important foundation-stone of the Church of Jesus Christ. Without it no true Gospel consecration can exist. I know that in some homes the lines were too tightly drawn, and in them the Lord's Day was gloomy and was a wearing to the children. Henry Ward Beecher, the brilliant pastor of Plymouth Church, used to give a humorous description of such Sabbaths. He described brother and himself watching the sun go down over western hills. In his boyhood Sunday was observed from the setting of the sun Saturday to the setting of the sun Sunday. No sooner would the sun sink over the western hills than these two boys would let out great yell, crying, "Hurrah! hurrah! Sunday's on! Now for some fun!" But though the Puritanic Sabbath was sometimes very angular in the rigid observance, I claim that Sabbath had ten chances to win the modern Sabbath has one, of producing such a family as Lyman Beecher developed. I claim that any man who wants his children to grow up to the high moral type of men and women, his forefathers and foremothers were, must give them at least one day in seven exclusively for sacred things, and not one day in seven in which to hunt and fish and drink and picnic and make calls, as the modern Sabbath desecrators are offering us. "The Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath," was a good doctrine as Christ taught it. But Christ never meant by this sentence that on the Sabbath Day man should walk hand-in-hand with sin as some people are doing. Give the Church consecrated Sabbath and the Church will give to the ultimately a human race redeemed from sin.

Selfish Indifference

I protest in the second place, against the iconoclasm which would eliminate from our lives the Divine principle of concern for the welfare of others. Profane iconoclastic hands have been undermining the foundation stones of our sacred Sabbath. Ay, these enemies of God have been doing more. They have been sneering and ridiculing the beautiful parable of the "Good Samaritan." They have been declaring that a man's neighbor belongs not to the family which lives near door to him. The only neighbor who has claims to be recognized is the wife or child who lives within the four walls of his own house. He has been asserting that a man's chief duty in life is to himself and his own. After the members of his immediate family have eaten enough and have a well filled wardrobe and a comfortable house to live in, then a man has fulfilled his chief end to society. His doctrine is, "Care for yourself and let others care for themselves in the same way."

"Can any good come out of such a Nazareth?" I once read of a great conqueror invading a country of the Far East. One day he entered a temple where stood an idol, so beautiful that not one of his followers was willing to destroy it. With an oath the conqueror said: "If you will not obey my commands, I will destroy it myself." He lifted his battle-ax. As he raised himself in his stirrups—for he had ridden his horse into the temple—with a mighty blow he shattered the idol into a thousand pieces. Then to his followers' surprise he revealed the fact that the inside of the idol was not a vacuum. It had been filled with thousands upon thousands of golden coins, which, as a lava bed, burst from the broken statue and rolled to the feet of the Western iconoclast. The iconoclast who destroys the beautiful image of charity and benevolence, may think that, too, will be able to grasp the wealth which it pours forth on the needy and the suffering, but he will be disappointed. The economy which refuses to give help to those who need, proves a canker to prosperity and the who withhold their charity come to poverty. The command is that he who loves God love his brother and the converse is true that he who does not love his brother proves that he does not love his God.

The "Golden Rule" with our ancestors was a practicality and not a mere theory. "Where are you going to-night, mother?" the father often asked. "You look tired, you ought not to be going out to-night." "I know it," she would say, "but I must go. Our neighbor is very sick. I am afraid she will not get well. They have sent for me to come and spend the night with her. I have fixed everything for breakfast. If I do not get back in time in the morning, why, you and the girls must get along somehow. Good-bye now. Make the children go to bed early."

Christian Beneficence

The daintiest delicacies ever cooked in the mother's stove were not for the growing boys, with healthy, voracious appetites. They were for the poor consumptive young girl who used to sit day after day upon the neighbor's veranda in the noon sun, smiling at us as we trudged away to school. My, how we cast longing eyes at those jellies. We then at times almost wished we could be sick, at least for a little while, to get a taste of them. And how warm and comfortable the mother's

How Denver's "White City" Grows

SOME interesting facts relating to the growth and success of the "city of tents," established by the Young Men's Christian Association of Denver, Colo.,—where a silent war against death is being waged,—may be gathered from a report of the work issued. The experiment was begun in May, 1903, with nine tents, and in one year from that time, forty-two tents were built and occupied. Although employment is not guaranteed to any of the young men who come there, many have been able to work, as their physical conditions permitted, some averaging an hour or two per day, while others worked ten days in a month. One man put in his total time as a carpenter.

Life in the Colorado climate invigorates and strengthens the class of invalids for which the farm is designed, and many patients win back health and health. The idea of the farm grew out of knowledge, born of long experience in trying to help a peculiarly helpless class of semi-invalids—consumptives, and those threatened with the dire disease. For years, the height of unreason has been expressed in the phrase, "He wants the earth," but scientists have begun to discover that there is real relation between the wants and the needs of man. Nothing short of getting back to the earth itself can cure a certain class of invalids, and there is no substitute for plenty of fresh, out-door air.

In the Young Men's Christian Association Farm, there are eight acres of garden, which adds much that is good and wholesome to the table supplies, as well as affording pleasant employment for the guests. The secretary of the Association, Mr. W. M. Danner, writes most encouragingly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the growth of the institution during the past year, and gives a summary regarding all who were admitted since the opening, May 21st, 1903, to April 30th, 1904. The total

The photograph shows a group of residents and workers at the Association Farm. Many distinguished people have visited the "White City" during the year, among whom were a number of physicians and clergymen. Many improvements are planned for the benefit of the patients, and next winter it is the intention to furnish steam heat and electric lights in all the tents.

The Association Health Farm is not a club, and is not a hotel, but rather a co-operative colony, where young men join in helping each other to get well. There is a well conducted church, occupying its own building, at the corner of the Farm, and residents are always gladly welcomed at the services. Nearly all Protestant denominations are represented among the dwellers at the Health Farm, and while church attendance is not imperative, no opportunity for spiritual work among the residents is neglected. They have formed a department of the Y.M.C.A. work. Those who are members of Eastern associations are invited to join the Health Farm

Y.M.C.A. Department, in case they neglect to bring memberships with them from the home associations. Each member becomes responsible to the colony for his own share of social life, as well as for a proper recognition and a careful observance of membership obligations.

Mr. W. M. Danner, the General Secretary, will gladly answer all requests for further information by readers, who may address him at the Y.M.C.A. Health Farm, Edgewater, Colo.

number admitted to the farm is eighty-four. Twenty-one States of the Union have been represented, the largest number coming from New York State. Most of the men are unmarried. A number have been furnished positions when sufficiently recovered to take them. A few have left, much improved, while only three of the whole number have died. Every effort is made to find remunerative occupations for residents, as soon as their physical condition warrants their acceptance of work.

An Age of Iconoclasm lected which mother knitted for the poor children live over the hill. And when the farmer who lived down the valley was prostrated with typhoid fever, and lay for months hovering between life and death, don't you remember how your father and the neighbors took turns ploughing his fields and sowing his grain and getting in his harvests? They say that that sick man was once a strong athlete. However that may be, when upon his sick-bed he heard what his neighbors had done, and how they had kept the wolf of hunger from his door, he died like a little child.

When the funerals of our fathers and forefathers. They never allowed a neighbor to be buried like a dog or friendless pauper, as sometimes we do. No. They literally practiced the Gospel rule: "It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to the house of feasting." When their neighbors wept, they wept. When their neighbors were lowered into their open graves, they themselves held the ropes that gently let down the cains. Was not their way

Better Than Our Way?

We live and breathe for self. Was not the Christian living hand our forefathers extended to the troubled ones in their midst, better than the icy stare with which we regard our neighbors? We grumble in a street car because we have to wait for two minutes while a funeral procession, wending its way to the cemetery, is holding up a crossing. The Golden Rule which our forefathers practiced, should never be allowed to slip out of our lives. The sick man who lives next door to us should be just as carefully cared for and nursed by us, as if he was our own son.

deplore also the iconoclasm which is robbing this country of the sanctity of home life. The iconoclast's profane hands are also snatching away our home enjoyments. They are saying to modern man: "Man, do not be an old-fashioned granny. Do not think, because your grandfathers found most of their enjoyment in the society of your grandmothers, and your uncles and aunts, that you have to find most of your enjoyment in the society of your wives and children. Do not forever be a 'stay-at-home.' Come out of that little hicoop of yours. If you want to give a reception to your friends, do not give it in your home. It is too small. Hire a big hall in the centre of the town, where you can receive in better style. There, instead of having a few cakes baked by your own hands, and some ice-cream which you made in your own 'freezers' you can have a fine caterer furnish an elaborate supper. Instead of having your own daughter sing a simple song, or your little boy recite a piece, you can have the finest of orchestras furnish the music. If you want speaking, you can hire a professional elocutionist to recite. This is an age of progress. The club-house, the public reception halls, the large dinners given in large downtown restaurants, just as certainly mark the evolution of the human race in pleasure, as a locomotive train is an improvement over the old prairie schooner."

Do you, my brother, think for one instant that the advent of the modern club-house and public reception hall and Delmonico banquets, is a moral improvement for modern men over the old-fashioned quilting parties and merry-making frolics of bygone days? Do you think this? I do not. I believe that any enjoyment which a man is compelled systematically to find outside of the society of his wife and children and home is a depleting, enervating, and, ultimately, degrading enjoyment. I believe that any enjoyment which systematically makes a mother relegate the care of her children to nurse-girls and to hired hands, is an enjoyment which is poisoned through and through by evil influences which will ultimately bring forth harvestings, not for God, but for Satan. I believe this tendency of the human race, this evil to find enjoyment anywhere, everywhere, except at home by your own fireside, will ultimately result in a second downfall of man, unless man himself, by the grace of God, halts, and learns again to find his chief pleasures in the associations of his wife and children within the four walls of his own home. I once heard father say to my mother: "I hope after we are dead that our children will believe we have loved them and have wanted to be with them more than with anyone else on earth." They lived for us. Yes, our parents lived for us. May we be like the old folks. May we find our chief enjoyment not only in living for our children, but also in the companionship of our children, no matter how old or how young they may be. May modern society not be involuted into the pleasures of a club-house or a public reception hall; but be evolved into the sanctified enjoyments of a Christian home.

But lastly, I would state that the iconoclasts of this day are trying to side-track the chief purpose for which our forefathers and foremothers lived in reference to their children. Instead of leading a parent to the altar of Jesus and saying: "Oh fathers and mothers, the chief desire of your lives should be to consecrate your children at these altars and have them make a public profession of Christ here," they would break these altars. They would say "Here is the statue of Wisdom, dedicate your children here. Send your boys to college and give them an intellectual education." "Here is the Statue of Midas. Sacrifice here, that you may leave them money." Thus we see hundreds of parents working by day and night to give their children—what? To give them to God and the higher life as their parents tried to do? No. To give them to a worldly success, which those parents in their hearts know may only lead their children to moral ruin; and perhaps to eternal death. Oh man, I ask of you one question. It is

A Blunt Question

Will you answer me honestly? What would you sooner have had your father to have been? A great speaker, a great financier, a great general, or a simple, noble, pure-hearted and devoted servant of Christ as he was and is to-day in heaven? You answer well. There is but one right answer. Then if the noble, pure, gentle Christian life of your father meant so much to you, can you not, will you not give to your boy the same Christian heritage? Shall not the chief purpose of your Christian parents in reference to their children be duplicated in the chief purpose of your life, to bring to Christ your children and your children's children?

To-day let us have some of the old-fashioned purposes and ways and habits of our forefathers. When we are dying may we never be ashamed to utter the words which Dwight L. Moody said to his children. "You all have read them. "May we not be ambitious to make money. May we not be ambitious for worldly fame and honors. May we simply be ambitious to find a consecrated earnest place to work in God's vineyard for him." That purpose is a noble purpose. That purpose God will bless as he has blessed that holy purpose in the lives of the old-fashioned folks who are now in heaven awaiting the home-coming of their children. That purpose forms the true foundation, the maker and builder of which is the Living and True and Pardoning and Redeeming and Ascended and Glorified Christ. May God answer the fulfilment of this prayer for pulpit and pew alike.

Housewives of the Holy Land

HOW THEY PREPARE THEIR LEAVEN AND BAKE THEIR BREAD—A VISIT TO THE FRIENDS' MISSION AT RAM-ALLAH

BREAD-MAKING may be a very common-place affair in the West, where the great majority of housekeepers are accustomed to get their bread brought to the door daily in the baker's van. Not so, however, in Syria. There every woman knows how to make bread, or at least how to knead the dough. Everything about it is regarded as sacred, by the people who handle it. The reverence with which bread is treated is very striking. If a loaf or a fragment falls to the ground by accident, it is carefully picked up, carried to the lips, and placed on the crown of the head, before it is put aside for use.

Leaven is procured in this way: On the eve of the 6th of January (the anniversary of our Lord's baptism by John), a woman takes a small quantity of flour-water and makes a ball of dough the size of an orange. This she ties up in a clean piece of calico or print, together with a bunch of "quoisee," a fragrant herb (like sage), supposed to possess certain supernatural and medicinal properties, and several slices of a bulb (cylamen) called "Bachoor Mariam" (incense of Mary), strung on a string, together with several small, round lamp-wicks. This odd assortment she commits to the hands of her son, and tells him to hang it on any tree in front of the house, except the mulberry.

When other trees on Holy Night bow down,

The mulberry alone lifts up her crown.

And proud, because from her the worms are fed,

Which silk produce, will not bow down her head.

Next morning, before daylight (it may be under a heavy rain, and carrying a lantern), he proceeds to the village fountain, the waters of which, for the six days following the anniversary, are considered sacred; here he meets boys from many homes, each with a "bachoor" in his hand, and they begin to sing in unison an old-time, well-known rhyme, "St. John baptiseth thee, and the lady is thy god-mother," at the same time dipping the "bachoor" in the water; they then withdraw a little, and return, repeating the ceremony three times. On returning home they again hang up the "bachoor" on the tree. Having dipped the "bachoor" three mornings in succession, the dough sours, rises, and becomes first-class leaven, which the housewife tests initially, by making a quantity of doughnuts, fried in olive oil, to be eaten with sugar or grapes. A lump of this dough is reserved, hidden in the barrel of flour, for the next baking.

There are different kinds of loaves made in different parts of the country; especially in cities it is possible to obtain variety. Here you find exposed for sale huge trays of loaves of a kind known as "kammaje," round and small, the size of a dinner-plate, and made of fine flour, rolled with a rolling-pin. When baked, they are puffed up and hollow. A similar loaf, not rolled, and of inferior quality, is called "mawy." City bakers use different kinds of leaven, German yeast, etc., and much of the bread is adulterated, tasteless and unwholesome.

I have seen bread made in Beyrout by ladies in their own homes. They would mix the dough, and make it up into a quantity of loaves (balls about the size of an orange), say sixty, which they rolled out, a quarter of an inch thick, and arranged in rows on a sheet, spread on the floor. These they covered with another sheet, or blanket, and when ready for baking they placed them on straw-trays and sent them to a public oven.

Three ways of baking bread are in vogue in our district, Mt. Lebanon. The fellaheen still use the tannoor. This is a hole dug in the ground, about three feet deep and two and one-half wide, lined with a strong porcelain-like cement. Into this, grass and light-brushwood are thrown, and when the flames die down and the mass of red embers show a ruddy glow at the bottom of the miniature pit, the housewife, with her dough ready at hand, pats it out on a little board in front of her, twirls it round her hands until it is almost transparent and thin as paper, flings it on to a large, thick, round cushion, made for the purpose, and dabs it quickly on to the inner side of the hole. She then quickly pats out another ball of dough, and whisking off the loaf from the side of the oven, replaces it by another, repeating the operation until the batch is finished. Another simple and common way of baking is to use the saj—a circular sheet of iron, like a shield, convex on the upper side. It can be used anywhere, and since it is easily portable, is used frequently by the bedawin. All that is necessary is to arrange a semicircle of stones to support the saj, kindle brushwood underneath, and deftly dab the cushion with the loaf spread on it, on to the heated iron. In half a minute it is crisp and ready. The tannoor and the saj are, however, fast giving way to the public oven.

Mt. Lebanon, Syria.

Ram Allah is situated among the hills of Benjamin, and is a small town ten miles north of Jerusalem. It lies between Bethel and the Mizpeh of Samuel. Lil most proper nouns in this country, it is a name with meaning, Ram-Hill and Allah-God; so the Friends' Mission is planted on the "Hill of God." From the house-tops one can easily see the Holy City and all Jaffa and the sea.

Thirty-five years ago, Eli and Sibyl Jones, ministers of the Gospel, living at South China, Me., felt a burden laid on their hearts to visit Palestine. After preaching at various places, they came to Ram Allah. One day, while walking through one of the narrow streets, a native girl about fifteen years old stopped them and asked if they would not start a school for girls, offering herself as teacher. They learned that she had been taught in the school of Sister Charlotte, a German Deaconess in Jerusalem. Some money had been given the Friends for mission purposes, so they at once opened a day-school for girls, with Miriam as teacher. The work has had a steady growth, and now instead of one small day-school, there are two boarding-schools, or "Training-homes" (one for girls and one for boys), six day-schools taught by native teachers, who have been trained in the boarding-school, one Bible-woman and one native doctor.

The Friends employ five Americans, seventeen native Syrians and one Armenian. Over three hundred children are given daily instruction in Scripture, common school branches, and domestic and industrial work. The Bible-women and also the day-school teachers hold religious meetings among the women, and four Sabbath Schools are maintained.

You will be pleased to know that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is received, and enjoyed at both the training homes, and the pictures are often cut out for the day-school children.

In one of the day-schools, situated in a villa about six miles from Ram Allah, about half the children are from the homes of Mohammedan families. The story of the Christ has thus been carried into these dark homes, and the Moslem women requested one of the teachers of the school to come and teach them. Now she goes once a week to their part of the village and holds meetings with these Mohammedan mothers, and says that many of them are more willing and eager to hear the truth than those who are called Christians.

"Dr. Ghosn el-Howie, of Mt. Lebanon, and his daughter came and spent five days with us. He held some public meetings and spoke to the people in their native tongue. In one of these meetings he said: 'Children, you have a temptation to meet that your fathers never had. What is it?' Almost immediately the boys answered, 'Intemperance.'

"The boys at the Training Home have an A. H. Society. The letters mean, 'Against Things Harmful.' The object of the Society is to discourage the use of alcoholic liquors, cigarettes and baccho in any form, impure acts and thoughts, and also profane language and all forms of disrespect and bad temper, and to encourage kindness to living things. The members have signed a pledge to abstain from things harmful and to encourage others to do the same.

"Besides their studies in Arabic and English these boys are all taught to use tools."

ROSA E. LEE

Miss Lee, the writer of the foregoing letter, is Matron of the Boys' Training School at Ram Allah (Ramleh), and has been actively identified with the work for a number of years. It is a model institution, beautifully kept, and well deserving a visit from tourists and Palestine who are interested in Christian and educational work.

READY FOR THE BIBLE-CLASS MEETING

The Awakening of Persia

By DR. HANNAH Y. JACOB, OF URMIAH

HANNAH Y. JACOB
Hakim Hanum (the lady doctor)

WHEN the American missionaries first came to Persia, it is said they found but one woman who could read. She was the sister of Mar Shinon, the Armenian patriarch in Kochanos, Kurdistan. There were no common schools at that time, and those who were preparing for the church were dependent upon private schools, which were few in number and taught by the clergy. In some villages there would be only one man who could read and write, but oftener there could not be found even one.

"Book learning" was considered only second in sacredness to priestly orders, while preaching in the vernacular in the churches was seldom heard. Modes of living were extremely primitive, two or three generations sometimes occupying a single room, which was occasionally shared by cows and hens. Before the advent of missions, any good-looking young girl, or one with property, could be dragged from home, and forced to become a Mohammedan.

Missionaries were denied many privileges then, and even now many wrongs are not yet righted, as the Mohammedan religion says that all who are not of this faith are "low, mean, defiled, and inferior." The influence of the Gospel has been such as to elevate the people, not only spiritually but materially, and they are living in better homes, and are greatly improved in general surroundings.

In Persia a traveler can always distinguish a Christian from a Mohammedan village, as the buildings of the former are much cleaner and neater.

The weaver sings as the shuttle flies back and forth in his simple loom, set at one side of the room. Spinning is done by women who prepare the work for the weaver. The daughter of the house sits where the light comes through the skylight in the roof, and, embroidery in hand, she moves as the light moves. Carpet and rug work is done mostly by women and children. More than two-thirds of the workers are boys between the ages of seven and sixteen. The little hands patiently tie thousands of threads in the making of beautiful carpets, which sometimes are three years in the making.

The presence of a missionary in a village, or even his journeying through it, seems to give to the people a sense of peace and security. It is not because the missionaries exercise any political influence; but they are known as "apostles of peace," charity, truth and unselfishness. The very word "Protestant," signifies to the Mohammedan strict temperance, charity and goodness.

Among the higher classes, one of the first questions is, "What is your religion?" If the answer be "I am Protestant," questioner is pleased. A few years ago a Mohammedan—a man of rank and wealth—asked a chance acquaintance, who was an Armenian, what was his religion. The Armenian told him that he did not believe in any religion. The Mohammedan replied: "Although I am a Mohammedan, I feel and believe that there will come a time when everybody will become a Protestant." This wise man of the Orient knew in his innermost soul that those qualities which he found in no other religion except the Christian, would conquer at last, and live.

Illiteracy among the masses is fast disappearing. Most of the people of the plain of Urmiah are now able to read and write, and the principal text-book is the Bible. In the Sunday Schools men and women of thirty and forty, and even older, are being instructed by teachers often not half their own age, and they apply themselves with great perseverance and earnestness to the task of learning to read the Bible for themselves. Missionary work began in Tabriz in 1873, and seven years later schools were started. Since then, hundreds of boys and girls have been instructed, not only in the way of salvation, but they have been taught housekeeping, various kinds of handiwork, several languages, and bookkeeping. Schools, through these pupils, have shed light, happiness, cleanliness, and order wherever they have gone.

During my travels, I have found these graduates like lighthouses, their light shining and penetrating the darkness far and near. I was much impressed by this at Meandab. Between neighboring houses there would be but the difference of a few feet. Then what could make such a vast difference between them? What, but the Divine love? And there was just as much difference between the children, although all had a common playground. The boys' school in Tabriz numbers about one hundred pupils, and seven languages are taught, as well as bookkeeping. A kindergarten is also connected with the school. For the girls there is a boarding and day school, as well as a kindergarten. The Gospel work in Tabriz is carried on by house-to-house visitation from village to village, in the suburbs of the city, as well as by long journeys through the country. A Nestorian evangelist, with beaming face, told me about the blessed opportunities among the Moslems everywhere.

"Formerly," he said, "on meeting Mohammedans, Christians were invited to accept Mohammedanism, and they were often beaten and ill-treated for confessing Christ, the Son of God (it is still dangerous to confess Christ in many places), now," he continued, "they have ceased to invite us; but we Christians are not letting them alone. We are going from state to state, from city to city, from village to village; to their homes, their orchards and vineyards, and to the bazaars. Everywhere, at all seasons, day and night, we are pressing and persuading them to accept Christ."

CHURNING BUTTER IN PERSIA
The milk in the skin is kept agitated

Missionary work and its results cannot be weighed and measured by the number of communicants and followers, or by the gold spent. The work is deep and far-reaching in its results, and much is done through private conversation in gatherings among the Aime-nians and others, while they in turn seek every opportunity to diffuse the light of the Gospel. In the beginning of this work, my father preached in Tabriz, and there laid down his life. Kasha Moshy (Pastor Moses), a Nestorian worker, has unceasingly and untiringly witnessed for Christ, in palaces of the great and in the humblest places. He says that "a great and wonderful change has taken place during the past thirty years." He has had many dangerous experiences and wonderful deliverances. He is one of the best debaters, but never gives offence when arguing with a Mohammedan. The missionaries have revived the ancient Assyrian Christian Church on the plain of Urmiah, and are trying to make her remember and appreciate what a heritage is left to her of evangelizing those in darkness.

More than thirty years ago, Pastor Jacob went forth with Scrip and staff, his heart full of Christ's love and pity for the darkened millions in Russia. Like Paul of old, he supported himself by the work of his hands, at the same time making known the story of Jesus. The good man was imprisoned a number of times and was sent to Siberia, but was liberated, and, after bringing many souls into the Kingdom, he went to his rest. I could cite many instances where native evangelists and preachers have been beaten, stoned, reviled and persecuted for the sake of Christ, but who afterward were even more constrained than ever to do his work. We could never repay the missionaries for what they have done for us, and we thank God that he sent them, and that he has now given us the privilege of imparting the same message of love and salvation to the loveless, and of light and life to those who still sit in darkness.

CAMPING OUT ON THE PLAINS

WHEN the new Oklahoma Country was opened to settlement, a few years ago, the different Home Missionary Organizations undertook to work the field; but they soon found many difficulties in the way.

Much of the work is still of a pioneer character. The Rev. R. S. Smedley, a missionary of the American Christian Missionary Society, is one of the successful workers in that field to-day. He travels in a Gospel Wagon, in which his wife accompanies him as organist, singer, cook, companion, and general helper in the meetings. The cover of the wagon is high enough for a person to stand erect, and is arranged to close up tightly, with curtains for protection. Under the seat may be carried an assortment of hymn-books, Bibles, tracts, papers, etc., for use in the meetings. The wagon also contains a small table, two chairs, mattress, telescope organ, cooking utensils, and necessary clothing, so that the workers can stay out on the road six months or a year at a time, if they wish. By a few simple readjustments they can spread a mattress in the wagon, and sleep comfortably if stranded on the road over night. This they have often done, picketing the ponies out, with rope and picket-pin. Our photograph shows them preparing to spend the night out on the lonely plains, the table set for supper, which Mrs. Smedley is cooking.

This method of evangelism necessitates hardship and privation, but it also affords independence in the work and makes it practicable to reach many places that are destitute of religious advantages. "We do not stop for cold or storm," Mr. Smedley says. "We always meet our appointments. In extremely cold days, we light the lantern and put it under the lap-robe. Last winter, in the Northwestern Territory, near 'No Man's Land,' I frosted my feet. We started out last year, after the Missionary Convention at Oklahoma City in September, and did not again see our home, or our little son, until the middle of March, over six months. During this time, we assisted in building one church and organized three other congregations."

Since 1901, work has been opened up in fifteen counties of the Territory. They have organized or reorganized twenty congregations, and have actively assisted in building fifteen houses of worship, and two more under way.

Pastor Wagner's Visit

GLADLY do we welcome Pastor Charles Wagner, the apostle of The Simple Life, who comes to give us the message from his own lips, that he has taught so sweetly and beautifully in his books. His visit will be all too short, but we trust that he will see enough in our land and people to induce him to come again soon and stay longer.

In no country on earth is his message so needed as in this. We fret and strain and worry ourselves to get ahead and make money, and we pride ourselves on our inventions and improvements, but how many of us miss the real good of life! Pastor Wagner brings us a better philosophy. He does not depreciate the benefits of civilization; especially he does not discourage the honest endeavor to achieve a competency; but he would have us learn that the sources of happiness and the development of society lie deeper than all these. These are good, he practically says, let us have them by all means. Men ought to strive to excel and endeavor to make material progress; but let them not make the mistake of limiting their efforts to those aims, or think that success in them will make them happier or better. It is in the development of character that there is hope. When a man becomes purer, more loving and lovable, kinder of heart and speech, more friendly and neighborly—in a word, more Godlike—he has made real progress.

The philosophy is not new; Jesus told us that "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things that he possesseth." But we had overlooked the fact. In the hurry and press of life we have mistaken the incidentals for the essentials, and have allowed the background and accessories to crowd out the picture. Like the angel in Bunyan's matchless allegory, Pastor Wagner bids us not to be so engrossed with the straw and stubble we are raking together, that we miss the crown that is being offered us.

Pastor Wagner is no ascetic, no censor of any class or condition. He says he has lived with rich and poor alike, and has noticed that in the one class, the love of the material comforts they possess, is paralleled in the other by the chagrin at not having them, while in both classes he has found men living happy, simple lives. He would have us subordinate the intense yearning for wealth and station to the desire for righteousness and the cultivation of sympathy with the unhappy, and a spirit of helpfulness that will tend to the general welfare. As he has said, he would have man be a man, and not show in his life the characteristics of a fox, a hare, a hog, or a bird of prey. It is a message for the times, and we hope his voice will reach the ears and hearts of the people.

"When Rogues Fall Out—"

HONEST men get their due," says the familiar proverb, and there would seem to be a good deal of truth in the homely adage, after all. Our Post-Office authorities have lately been keeping a vigilant look-out for "get-rich-quick" swindlers, whose alluring literature has been flooding the mails, and entrapping thousands of unsuspecting people in the rural districts, into dazzling schemes for the acquisition of sudden wealth. Without exception, the glittering investments proved to be vulgar humbugs, the cheapest kind of common swindles; yet such is the simple credulity of human nature, that the victims were numbered by the thousands. Complaints to the authorities usually resulted in the seizure of the mail addressed to the "get-rich" concerns, and the unceremonious flight of the swindlers to escape arrest, but never, so far as known, in the restoration of a dollar to the victims.

Quite lately, a band of specially bold depredators, who lived principally by preying upon reputable financial concerns through intimidation, quarreled among themselves. One of their number, either conscience-stricken at his own infamy, or afraid of the terrors of the law, decamped, after making a published confession. He wrote that the paper issued by his confederates and himself, "was conceived in iniquity," and had but one object: "to influence money from trusting country people," to the get-rich-quick concerns, controlled by the swindlers.

Herein is a salutary lesson which all may heed. Never trust the alluring promises of those who are ready to shower riches upon you—for a small consideration. Never trust those who agree to magically multiply the value of an investment out of all reason. Never trust the concern that comes with the fascinating bait of big names and the assurance of "fabulous returns." The only safe investment is that which promises normal results, and which will bear the closest investigation. High interest means poor security. Don't send your money to strangers on the strength of assurances of a golden harvest, reaped without effort in an incredibly short time. All their finely worded and alluring circulars are traps for the unwary—honey to catch the silly flies.

You may set it down as a certainty, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, that no really substantial project, which can be demonstrated to the reasonable satisfaction of business men, ever needs to go hunting for capital and coaxing away the hard-earned savings of the rural population. There are millions upon millions of dollars ready to float legitimate enterprises, without compelling the projectors to go begging for dime to dollar subscriptions.

If the conscience-stricken rogue who turned the calcium light on his rascally confederates and their tricks, never did another good deed in his life, he has at least done one commendable act in sounding a warning to country people to distrust all "get-rich-quick" schemes. It will be a fortunate thing for the whole country if public opinion, an aroused press, and the strong arm of the law should succeed in suppressing them altogether.

Russia's Real Problem

CLOSE observers of the "signs of the times" in Russia, are already becoming convinced that the war with Japan, end how and when it may, will in all probability soon be regarded as secondary in importance to other problems, that must more closely affect the future welfare and interests of the Czar's vast empire. They intimate that Russia's greatest problem is at home.

As the years roll on, the world progresses, and Russia is not wholly insensible to the spirit of the age. Some of her leading statesmen, and not a few of her foremost editors, have recently been more than usually frank in their opinions on the tendency to liberal views, among a portion at least of the educated classes.

It is by no means a secret that even in the highest circles in Russia, there are to be found friends of constitutional reform; men of elevated station and brilliant abilities, who have nothing in common with officials of the De Plehve or Bobrikoff stamp, and who regard the overshadowing Grand-Ducal influence as an unfortunate delegation of authority which is responsible for many things that patriotic Russians cannot approve. In the prevalent corruption of every branch of the official service, there is found one of the most powerful reasons for a radical change, which could be introduced only by the substitution of a responsible ministry, with individual accountability in each department. The practical obliteration of the authority of the Zemstvos (or provincial assemblies) is another far-reaching evil that calls for reform. Some day in the future, the people confidently hope to see a better educational system, freedom of the press and of public assemblage, and equal treatment for Jew, Pole and Finlander. That these will ultimately be realized is as certain as the sunrise.

It is worthy of note, however, that amid all the criticism of existing conditions—evidence of the fact that Russia is beginning to see herself as she really is—there is found hardly a word of censure for the throne. To the core, the people, high and low, are loyal to the Czar, and should he heed "the signs of the times" and inaugurate the reforms for which his subjects are patiently hoping, the "Little Father" might yet be extolled as the greatest of the Romanoffs.

A GREAT OFFER REPEATED

In our issue of August 31st, we made the following announcement:

One of the most interesting and helpful books ever published, offered at half-price, and even at that, sent all charges prepaid!

THE SPEAKING OAK

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART

containing 300 Tales of Life, Love and Adventure, bound to please and fascinate, to instruct and elevate.

Rich beyond measure, with a wealth of original anecdotes, humorous and pathetic, but always bright and sparkling, it will be read and re-read with increasing interest until its pages are thumb-worn, and its contents indelibly impressed on the minds of its countless enthusiastic readers.

Eleven original stories of Lincoln—never before published—new stories of "Stonewall" Jackson, Washington Irving, General Grant, Presidents Harrison, Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt, and hundreds of other anecdotes, sentimental, pathetic, humorous, moral and religious, make this volume a treasure rich beyond compare for family reading, and unusually helpful to orators, essayists, preachers and Christian workers the world over.

Containing 400 large pages, printed on featherweight paper (to facilitate the convenient handling of the book), with numerous beautifully illustrated inserts on fine plate paper, all substantially bound in high-grade cloth, with artistic side and back stamp, this volume will be welcomed by thousands of families who appreciate excellent reading, presented in the most approved style of modern artistic bookmaking.

Last year we printed 30,000 copies of this excellent volume, and of this enormous edition we have a remnant, which we must close out in order to make room for our new Premiums. We therefore offer this small lot at the absurdly low figure of FIFTY CENTS, and, even at this low price, we prepay all express charges.

This is the greatest book bargain ever submitted to our readers, and but for the gigantic preparations we are making for the coming season, and the need for every inch of available space, we would prefer to keep the books to selling them at a figure that positively entails financial sacrifice on our part.

If you wish to receive one of these books, please act promptly. We hardly ever make an offer in these columns that does not bring more orders than we can fill, and we think in this instance the books on hand will be sold five times over.

At the time of this writing, we find that we have still a number of copies of The Speaking Oak left. As we must sell them out in order to make room for new premiums, we again offer them to such of our readers as have not yet obtained a copy of this most remarkable book, at Fifty Cents Each, and guarantee their safe and undamaged delivery, express charges prepaid.

If our readers will kindly bear in mind that the express charges are Twenty-five Cents, and that we prepay these charges, they will readily perceive that this is indeed a great book bargain, and one that should not be permitted to pass by unimproved. Send Fifty Cents to-day, with your full address and the name of your express office, and we will send you Dr. Iglehart's wonderful and beautifully illustrated book, The Speaking Oak, containing over 400 large pages, all charges paid. Import duty in Canada not included.

Germany's Future Empress

THE DUCHESS CECILIA

ROYAL marriages, though generally without the element of romance which renders other unions so interesting to the public, have a compensating element of interest in the high position of the persons concerned. The announcement, therefore, by Emperor William of Germany, that Frederick William, his eldest son and the heir to the throne, has been betrothed, is important news for Germans everywhere. The young man is only twenty-two years old, but he has been so adventurous as to fill a large place in the public eye, and his escapades have been matter for journalistic comment. The lady selected by his father as a wife for him, is the Duchess Cecilia of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, daughter of the late Grand Duke Frederick Francis III, who died seven years ago. Her mother is a Russian princess, a cousin of the late Emperor Alexander III. The Duchess Cecilia is in her eighteenth year, and is said to be very pretty and accomplished. She speaks German, English, French and Russian, and is proficient in other knowledge. The alliance is expected to further German ambitions in the North, due to the proximity of the Principality to Holland. It forms, too, another link, of which there are so many among the reigning houses of Europe, with the Danish royal family. The elder sister of the Duchess is the wife of the Danish Crown Prince, and therefore will probably, at some future time, be Queen of Denmark. The Germans do not appear to know much of their future Empress, but will doubtless give her a cordial welcome for the sake of the illustrious station she will hold. As her influence in the court and nation will be potent, we may hope that she will be of that character recommended to the old-time king.

Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain; but a woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised (Prov. 31: 30).

Liberated by the Czar

Remarkable scenes were witnessed in St. Petersburg, Moscow, Kieff, and other Russian cities, a few days ago, on the occasion of the christening of the infant son of the Czar. By the imperial mandate, a large number of offenders under the common law were released and an amnesty was proclaimed for political offences, except those which had involved murder. It is much easier to get into prison in Russia than it is to get out, for the process of the law is slow, and the prisoner has but few facilities for getting evidence to vindicate him. It must, therefore, have been glad news to many a prisoner, to learn that he was to be set free without trial. No statistics have yet been published of the number who thus obtained their liberty, but if the officials fully obeyed the orders of the Emperor it must have been very large. Other acts of grace in the same manifesto, were the abolition of corporal punishment in the rural districts, and in the army and navy for first offences; the remission of arrears in payments on debts due to the Government; certain unimportant modifications of the anti-Jewish laws; and the establishment of a fund of a million dollars for the support of the families of soldiers and sailors who have died in the war. The beneficiaries under this imperial edict have reason to congratulate themselves on the birth of the royal child, which has won for them the Emperor's favor. To those especially for whom the prison gates were opened, the event must have been a matter for thankfulness. How many there are, however, in every land among the captives of sin, who might thus be liberated if they would only put their trust in Him who was born into this world for their deliverance.

The Lord hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound (Isa. 61: 1).

Reformed by an Operation

One of the most remarkable instances of the moral effect of a surgical operation is reported from Indianapolis. A woman brought her son, who is fifteen years old, into the Juvenile Court of that city and asked to have him committed to some reformatory institution as incorrigible. She said he had been away from home for five days, living a vile and wicked life. She told a deplorable story of his conduct. He was, at times, surly, and at others manifested a fierce and ungovernable temper. He obstinately refused to attend school, and had made himself an absolute terror at home. As ter the operation and was then allowed to return home. The change in the boy's disposition was extraordinary. He had become quiet and dutiful, was willing to go to school, and was in all respects a changed character. More and more we are learning how close is the connection between the material and the moral in our being. How important, therefore, is it that the body should be kept not only from injury, but from the contamination which affects the soul.

Know ye not that ye are the temple of God? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy (1. Cor. 3: 16).

EARL GREY

Canada's New Ruler

Our Canadian friends are pleased with the appointment of Earl Grey as successor to Lord Minto in the Governor Generalship. The administration of Lord Minto was very popular in the Dominion, and therefore the fact that Earl Grey is the brother of Lady Minto will be an augury of pleasant association. Earl Grey is fifty-three years of age, and has a reputation for sagacity and administrative ability of a high order. He was educated at Harrow, and is a graduate of Cambridge University, where he took a first class in Law and History. He has served in Parliament as member for a division of Northumberland. Subsequently, he went to South Africa, as Governor of Rhodesia, where his duties were of an exceedingly difficult character, and were performed with rare diplomatic ability. He also served in the Boer War. His reputation, however, for social and philanthropic work is still higher than his legislative and administrative record. He initiated a scheme for the restriction of the liquor traffic, by establishing houses to encourage the substitution of tea and coffee for intoxicating drinks, and for making the sale of the latter of no pecuniary advantage to the seller. About 114 of these houses have been established, and are said to be prosperous. Earl Grey has been married twenty-seven years, and has four children. His wife is the daughter of Mr. R. Stayner Holford, of Gloucestershire, England. She has taken a deep interest in her husband's social activities, and has proved a charming and popular hostess. We trust the new administration will be eminently successful, and, that at its close, it may be said of its head, as it was of the ancient king:

He wrought that which was good and right and truth before the Lord his God. And in every work that he began he did it with all his heart, and prospered (II. Chron. 31: 20, 21).

BRIEF NOTES

Madame Carlier, the wife of the French Ambassador at Constantinople, has received the Cross of the Legion of Honor for a deed of daring. She stood at the door of her house with a revolver in her hand, and defended five hundred Armenians who had taken refuge therein from Turkish rioters.

Missionary progress in China during the past year has been remarkable. The London Missionary Society alone reports the accession of 1,755 persons.

A dark phenomenal record of crime is that of Mississippi for this year. During the first eight months there have been 569 murders in that State.

Mr. Carnegie appears to have transferred some of his enthusiasm for libraries to church organs. Several churches have received gifts of this kind from him, lately.

We are glad to see that the National Congregational Council to be held this month at Des Moines, Ia., is to give special attention to the question of industrial problems.

it was impossible to control him, she wished him placed under the care of the State. At the suggestion of the Probation Officer of the court, the boy was examined by a physician, who noticed a peculiar depression in his skull. The mother accounted for it by describing a fall that he had when he was three years old. He had, in falling, struck his head on a rock and had hurt himself severely. The physician thought that an operation might benefit the boy and it was performed. The part of the skull that was depressed was removed, when it was found that it had pressed upon the brain. Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the Marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old Marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the Marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the Marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the Marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the Marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the Marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness. By a clever ruse, Macartney compels Garron to let him take the marquis and Louise with him, in one of the ship's boats, while Garron is a prisoner in his cabin, disarmed and guarded by Brébœuf, who has now returned to de Vaudémont's service.

CHAPTER XXIV

WHERE CLEOPATRA SAILED

IT was, perhaps, half after nine o'clock when the escaping prisoners descended to the deck of the cutter lying alongside. The captain of the cutter was a master of that polyglot dialect, prevalent among seafarers in the Mediterranean, which is known as "Lingua-Franca," in which Macartney was also proficient, and they had no trouble in telling him what to do. Captain Schneider had received instructions from Garron, that he was to obey Macartney implicitly. He made no hesitation, therefore, about casting off, and beating up the bay toward the open sea. The wind was blowing fresh and strong from the eastward, and so soon as they rounded the point of Isle Bequières, which formed the northwestern extremity of the bay, they would have an easy run for the city, distant some ten miles away.

There was a little cabin in the cutter, and the vice-admiral, a man of nearly seventy years of age, and not naturally robust, concluded that he would lie down upon one of the transoms in the hope of snatching an hour or two of sleep, in order better to sustain the fatigues that he foresaw would be entailed upon him by their further adventures. He was already much exhausted by the scene in the cabin. Before he did so, he took occasion, once more, to apologize to Macartney.

"Monsieur Macartney," he said, after he had announced his intention of retiring to the cabin, "again I beg you to forgive me. I have been young who now am old. I have loved and have gained even as I have lost. I, too, am a sailor. I know what it must have cost you. Duty—'tis hard even for the old in the face of a woman, and for the young—" he lifted his hands with a characteristic gesture—"make what amends I may, monsieur. 'Tis an heavenly night, monsieur. I could have reveled in it fifty years ago. I leave it to you and Louise."

Discreetly enough, Aurore walked forward to the extreme edge of the cockpit, nestled down into a corner, and, like the marquis on the transom in the cabin, composed herself to slumber. The little enclosure aft was empty of all save grizzled old Herr Schneider and the two lovers. The Arabs of the crew were clustered around the mast forward. The captain was busy sailing the boat, and had no eyes for anything or anybody, discreet and worthy German that he was.

Louise and Macartney were practically alone. A little silence fell between them, the stillness of a sweet, his soul in his glance. "If you could know the anguish I passed through in that moment when you said you loved me and there was nothing for me to do but turn away! Yet, only the joy of now enables me to measure the agony of then."

"But you have not forgiven me! I want to hear that! To have that assurance!"

Macartney cast a swift glance aft. Herr Schneider was standing holding the tiller, and staring persistently up to windward, seeking to see if he could weather the point. Aurore was asleep. The Arab forward were concealed by the sail which threw a shadow over them.

"Forgive you!" he whispered.

He slipped his arm along the rail until it fell around her shoulders, and then he drew her to him. She was startled beyond measure. Yet she knew what she would do. The thought gave her almost a pang of terror. No man, no lover had ever—she would have struggled and moved, and something constrain her. Her bosom heaved.

"Mercy!" she murmured, as she had said once before, long ago.

But he had none for her now. His heart rose in her throat, and he found it upon her lips as he pressed them to his own. Her head fell back upon his shoulder. There was light enough, was it the embodiment of his own imagination that enabled him to see her face as it enabled her to see in his the illumination of a pure emotion.

She had hesitated, she had resisted, she had cried for mercy, now she was conquered. He could not kiss her long enough or deep enough. The years of service, of worship, of admiration, were lost in the joy of the flying seconds. She was his at last. He could feel his heart beating against his own, her lips spoke to him without a word, without sound, in kisses as sweet, ay, sweeter than life itself.

"Don't!" she said at last, "it is too much! I cannot bear so much—happiness."

"And you are mine, mine, after these years! Not England, not France, not anything, can take you from me now."

"Yours, yours, always! I have been a proud woman, mon—Robert—" Her voice lingered over his name—she gave herself to him. You will take me away. I shall be a stranger in a strange land. I shall never see France again. But I shall be yours, that will be enough!"

"My darling," whispered Macartney, "life shall be as you wish it. Where you go, I will follow; where you live, I will live; where you die, I will die; where you are buried, there will I be buried also. Having you, I can give up everything else."

"Yes, everything but honor and duty!"

"Had I not clung to those, dear, I would be unworthy of your love."

"That is the difference between man and woman," she sighed, enlightened at last by the knowledge which comes but once in a lifetime, and lasts forever.

"When a woman loves, she loves with all. You might be dishonored and shamed! I would grieve for that, but I would still love you. You might be false to your duty, and be disgraced; it would break my heart, but I would be true to you, I would love you."

"Yes, what would you think of me if I—"

"I would have you do what is right, but if you felt as—I only want to show you that a man's love is different from a woman's."

"Louise," answered Macartney, "I know that. Nothing that I should say or do or be, could make me worthy of you. I was not an admirable character, a careless, happy-go-lucky sailor, that day when I stumbled in upon you in the old ruined tower in Provence; but now I am different. From that day I have been more faithful, more constant, than the compass needle to the star. Wherever I have gone, whatever I have done, my heart has swung toward you. I have not had a thought that you could not share. There has not been an action that you could not know. I have tried, since

"Mademoiselle," said Bonaparte, abruptly,
"I proffer you my homage."

warm tropic night upon the water, broken by the soft splash of the waves, dashed into spray by the bows, and rippling caressingly along the sides. It was a night lovers long to dream upon and live in.

And they were happy. They had escaped, as by a miracle, from the direst of perils. They were conscious, with a full consciousness which does not come from intuition alone, but from a frank admission, that each the other loved. They sat close together, silent still.

Singularly enough it was the woman who moved. She reached out her hand, and took his in a warm and tender clasp.

"Will you forgive me, monsieur?" she murmured. "I asked you in the cabin of the ship yonder, but you did not say."

"Forgive you! Oh, Louise!" answered Macartney, saw you, to be worthy of you, and all my life will be one long regret that I did not see you before; that from the time I was enabled to shape my own conduct, I have not had you before me to inspire me, to help me, to lift me upward."

"I would not have you different," said the woman softly. "What I have loved has been here." She laid her hand upon his breast. How his heart quivered under the light touch of her fingers. "I could not want anything changed, for what is here fills my heart full. You are there, and it could contain nothing more."

She smiled at him as she spoke. Low upon the horizon the red, gold edge of the rising moon shot a ray across the waters. The light fell upon her face. His eyes devoured her, and reckless of who might see, the world forgetting, by the world forgot, he kissed her again.

"Monsieur," after a time—neither knew whether it was long or short—exclaimed the gruff voice of Herr Schneider, who was most persistently staring away from the lovers, "yonder are the lights of Alexandria. What next?"

"Aurore!" called Macartney quickly, as the maid sleepily came forward toward him, "summon your master."

As the marquis came out of the little trunk cabin the Irishman spoke boldly to him. There was little time in any event.

"Monsieur de Vaudémont, the comtesse has done me the honor to allow me to repair the frightful mischance of the evening," he said.

"But how, Captain Macartney?"

"She has deigned to accept my love, my lord. Have your consent to make her my wife?"

"Not to-night, surely!" exclaimed the old man.

"No, not to-night. I have a duty to perform."

"When, then?"

"When I have performed it." He paused. "At the earliest convenient season, Monsieur le Marquis."

"Be it so," said the marquis gravely. "You are a man of honor, a gentleman. You have served me, and shall serve the king of France. I am an old man, and he times, indeed, are out of joint. You will love her, you will watch over her, you will care for her?"

"As my own soul!" answered Macartney.

"God bless you!" said the marquis, reaching out his hand.

"May He so deal with me as I deal with her, monsieur."

Louise stood up and slipped her arms around the old man's neck.

"I love him," she whispered, "I love him."

"I know, my child," smiled the marquis, patting her gently on the shoulder. "Come, no tears now. We have work to do."

"The lights of Alexandria, monsieur," interrupted Macartney, pointing.

"You, too, have work to do," said the old man, "what are your plans?"

"To land you on the wharf yonder."

"And then?"

"You are going to leave me!" said Louise, "just when—"

"My child, the man must go, and you must bid him goodspeed. 'Tis for our king he strikes. But—" The marquis hesitated. "Yet our chances might be greater with Bonaparte, I imagine, if we brought him his English prisoner."

As he spoke the old man ostentatiously drew his sword, laid it down upon the transom and placed his pistol by its side. "I shall be compelled to take you with us, Captain Macartney, unless—"

Macartney was quick to take the hint. He seized sword and pistol, and pointed the weapon at the marquis.

"My lord," he said, smiling as he spoke, "turn about is fair play. I am master now. I will land you at the wharf. If you attempt to resist, I shall be under the painful necessity of pulling the trigger."

"I yield," said the marquis bowing gravely. "'Tis to force majure. You have my word, monsieur."

"I return your weapons, therefore. Captain Schneider, where can General Bonaparte be found?"

"At the governor's palace, doubtless, monsieur," replied the German. "The wharf ahead opens on the street that leads to where it is."

"Take us there. Pardon me, Monsieur le Marquis, but have you any money?"

"A little. Enough to secure an escort to the palace, and to pass myself through the guards, I fancy."

The little boat instantly shot up into the wind, the sail flapped, the sheet was hauled over, and the cutter drifted gently down to the pier-head. The nimble Arabs sprang out and secured it, temporarily taking a turn with a rope around one of the posts. A French sentry on the wharf challenged them. It was Macartney who replied.

"A boat from the French fleet at Aboukir, with messages for General Bonaparte. Here is our pass."

The sentry called the sergeant of the guard, and the two spelled out the wording of the pass.

"You may land your passengers, citizen," he said, drawing back and saluting.

The hour for parting had come. Aurore already stood on the wharf. The marquis started forward to hand his granddaughter over the side. Macartney was there before him. He bent low, as if to kiss her hand. The marquis tapped him on the shoulder.

"For this time," he said smiling, "you may go higher."

Louise bent her head, but Macartney availed himself to the full of the marquis' permission. He lifted it with his hand, and upon her lips he kissed her full. He stood watching the three disappear in the darkness, listening to their footfalls upon the wharf until that sound, too, died away in the distance.

"Now," he said to himself, as he stepped back upon the deck of the cutter and signed to the men to cast off, "for Nelson!"

CHAPTER XXV

AS ONE GENTLEMAN TO ANOTHER

BY the judicious expenditure of his last gold piece, the marquis succeeded in passing the guards around the palace, and in entering the garden; which, lighted by thousands of lamps among the broad-leaved palms and other tropical foliage, presented an enchanting picture.

Learning, in answer to his inquiry, that General Bonaparte had arrived and was within the palace, the vice-admiral made his way to the great stairway. Passing himself off as one of the guests of the fete, he ascended the stairs, and presented himself at the door of the Hall of Audience, and demanded an entrance. There was something so commanding in the quaint personality of the old man, that the soldier on guard, after a moment's hesitation, flung open the great doors.

The scene within the great hall was a brilliant panorama of life and color. It was Paris with all its beauty, with all its gaiety, transferred as if by some necromancer's wand to the Orient.

At the other end of the room the necromancer himself stood, half hidden by a group of men and officers, and women, too, which surrounded him, as moths are attracted to the candle's blaze. As the marquis, with his granddaughter upon his left arm, stepped forward, a lackey hastened to greet him with a low bow.

"Whom shall I announce?" he asked, with a stare of surprise at the quaint yet commanding old figure.

"Vice-Admiral le Marquis de Vaudémont of the Royal Navy of France," he answered calmly.

"But—" stammered the man, "we have no—"

"Announce me as I told you," said the marquis.

He was determined not to sail under false colors in that assemblage. The lackey's voice was high and shrill. It rang through the hall above the laughter and the babble of the crowd, above the music, above the patter of many footsteps. The astonishing announcement petrified everybody into a momentary silence. Instantly all eyes were turned to the door. In the front rank of the crowd, which moved toward the marquis and his granddaughter, was an enormous man, with a great shock of black hair and flashing black eyes. His huge bulk was covered by the brilliant uniform of a major-general.

"How now? Who is this?" he cried, in a thunderous voice, that comported well with his huge proportions. "What do you mean, citizen, by announcing Vice-Admiral le Marquis de Vaudémont of the Royal Navy of France?"

He turned his fierce gaze toward the lackey, who trembled before him as he spoke.

"Monsieur," said the marquis calmly, not a bit perturbed by the other's towering figure and roaring speech, "do not berate your servant. I am vice-admiral of the royal navy of France and the Marquis de Vaudémont besides. I compelled the man so to announce me."

The other looked down at the diminutive figure of the marquis, and laughed contemptuously.

"You!" he said. "You compelled—"

"Monsieur," returned the vice-admiral coolly, gently disengaging his granddaughter's hand, "you wear a sword. I take it that you know how to use it. Cease your laughter at once, sir, or you will find that I can compel even you—"

The major-general lifted his arm and snapped his fingers.

"Ho there!" he shouted to one of the guards. "Sergeant of the guard, arrest this—"

"General Kleber," said a tall, striking-looking man who had just forced his way through the crowd, whose flat nose and full lips showed that he had negro blood in his veins.

"What is it, Dumas?"

"General Bonaparte's compliments to you, and he wishes you to bring the strangers to him, in his cabinet yonder, at once."

"Come then," said Kleber roughly.

"Gladly," answered the vice-admiral. "I came here especially to see that general."

"Well, you won't be so glad after you have seen him, probably," said Kleber, turning his back on the marquis. "He doesn't like your kind."

"This way, monsieur. This way, mademoiselle," more courteously said the mulatto, who also wore the brilliant uniform of a general, as he pointed after the burly figure of Kleber.

The multitude gave way before their advance, although the people crowded as close as they could in order to see the strange figure made by the old man in his old-fashioned dress, almost forgotten by that generation, and the fresh beauty of the young woman who swept along by his side like a goddess. In a few moments, General Dumas, who was as polite as he was brave, drew back the hangings over a doorway, and motioned them to enter.

At the other end of a room, by the side of a table covered with despatches, stood a little officer, hat on head. He stared at them intently from his brilliant eyes, and when he realized that one of them was a woman, he instantly removed his plumed chapeau and tossed it on the table.

"You were announced," he said in sharp, incisive tones, as the two drew near to him, "as the Vice-Admiral le Marquis de Vaudémont of the Royal Navy of France, sir. How is that?"

"I am the Vice-Admiral le Marquis de Vaudémont of the Royal Navy of France."

The little officer snapped his fingers impatiently.

"Sir," he said, "what foolish play of words is this? There is no Royal Navy of France. What is left of it is there," pointing toward Aboukir, "under the flag of the Republic."

"I gave my name, a title that has been worn by my fathers for generations, my rank, as I won it with my sword, as it was conferred upon me by my king. I could not come before you under false pretences. Hence the announcement."

"And the lady, sir?"

"My granddaughter, the Comtesse de Vaudémont."

"Mademoiselle," said Bonaparte abruptly, "I proffer you my homage."

He was a connoisseur in the beauty of women, as he was in the strength of men, this little general, and his glance enveloped her with an admiration so swift, so keen, so manifest, and so searching, that for the moment it almost disconcerted her.

"La Salle, Eugene Marmont! A chair, some of you, for mademoiselle and the Marquis de Vaudémont, her grandfather, of the Royal Navy of France."

He smiled satirically as he spoke.

"Sir," said the vice-admiral, seating himself by the side of Louise, an example which General Bonaparte followed, "I would not accept your hospitality, I would not sit with you, were it not that age and infirmity and the fatigues of this night, past and to come, entitle me to consider myself."

"What, pray, have been the fatigues of the night past, and what are those to come?" asked General Bonaparte curiously. "Why have you come here? Where have you come from? What do you wish with me? Speak, monsieur."

He fired his questions at the vice-admiral as rapidly as discharges from a battery.

"Monsieur, you are General Bonaparte?" he asked.

"I am."

"Where have I seen you, monsieur?" said the marquis, somewhat irrelevantly, gazing at the general intently.

"I have been asking myself that question," said Bonaparte.

"At Toulon!" exclaimed Louise suddenly.

"Ah, exactly! You have a keen memory, mademoiselle. I recall it now. You were against the wall, our friends, the sansculottes, were about to cut you down."

"And you interposed," exclaimed the marquis. "The little officer on the horse! Monsieur, when the world rang with the name of Bonaparte I did not dream that you—"

"That I was he? Would it have made your antagonism any the less pronounced, my dear sir?" queried Bonaparte intently.

"Not in the least, sir. I allow no obligations which I personally may owe to bind me in my duty to my king. I did promise myself, however, that after the restoration of His Majesty, whom God protect and bring back speedily to France, I would see that your life was spared. That promise, monsieur," said the old man composedly, "I shall be ready to keep should you call upon me."

Bonaparte laughed.

"I shall call upon you without fail, my dear sir, should the contingency ever arise."

"And I shall not fail you, sir."

"Exactly. Now, monsieur," continued the general, "your errand? I would not seem discourteous, but time is pressing, and there is much to do."

"General Bonaparte, my party—"

"Who is in your party?"

"My granddaughter here, her maid, and my servant, bound from Genoa to La Vendée in a Neapolitan vessel, we were captured by Le Tonnant, Captain Jean Garron. Instead of reporting the capture to you, sir, he detained us aboard his ship and said nothing."

"General La Salle," said Bonaparte, calling a bright young officer, "was any report made of this capture to headquarters?"

"No, general," answered the man.

"Proceed, monsieur."

"Garron, who had been an ancient retainer of my family, desired to marry this young lady."

"But he has a wife in France."

"God pity her!" said the marquis.

A ROOM ON THE WALL

The Man Behind the Staff

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

"MY HEAD, MY HEAD!"

A MODEL roof garden was "the prophet's chamber" on the house in Shunem. It was built in the kind thoughtfulness of a man and his wife who honored God and his messengers. They had often seen the prophet Elisha passing by. One day the woman invited him in to eat bread; and after that he was urged to come again and again. Then the wife suggested to her husband that they build a room for him on the roof, which was the accustomed place for a guest chamber. It was built and furnished with a bed, a table, a settee, and a candlestick. By the outer stair, Elisha was free to come and go as he pleased. And, being apart by himself, he had opportunity for much needed rest and refreshment. It was to him a "Chamber of peace."

Doubtless he often lodged there, and not infrequently broke bread with his kind benefactors. He was grateful to them, and wished to do them a favor. He suggested to them that he could make a request of the king, or of the chief of the army in their behalf. But they replied that they were content in their home. But Elisha discovered a lack in it, for no child was there. In God's name he bade them expect that a son should be born to them. In due time they rejoiced in his birth. He was first the yeled, babe; then the jonek, suckling; then the olal, asking bread; then the gamul, weaned one, at two years of age; then the taph, little one following his mother about; then the naar, free to go. By these names Jewish people designated their children in the stages of their development. The growing child was, of course, tenderly loved by Elisha, as the child of prayer, and we cannot doubt that the little one often made its way to Elisha's chamber.

One day when Elisha was on Mt. Carmel, sixteen miles from Shunem, he saw coming up the mountain his kind hostess of Shunem. Even in the distance, he recognized signs of grief about her—a bowed form, and perhaps a garment of sackcloth. He sent his servant Gehazi to meet her, and ask, "What is the matter?" But she would not tell her sorrow to Gehazi, who was not the sort of man to be a comforter. She kept her sad story until she had thrown herself at the feet of Elisha. Then she told him that her child of promise was dead, and that even then he was lying in "the prophet's chamber" on the roof, where he had perhaps wished to be moved in his sickness because of his love of the prophet, or perhaps she thought there was some virtue in the place that would recover him. He had died there upon his mother's lap, having been brought in from the field, sunstruck while helping his father. What did Elisha propose to do about it? He gave his staff to Gehazi, his servant, and told him to go with all haste, not stopping for the long oriental salutations by the way, and lay it upon the face of the child. Gehazi started, but the sorrowing mother was not satisfied. She knew that Gehazi was not fitted to act for God, and she would have Elisha himself go. In that her instinct was true, for when she and Elisha reached the home in Shunem, they found that Gehazi, even with Elisha's staff, had failed to bring the child back to life.

Then Elisha shut himself in the room alone with the dead child and prayed to God for help. He put his warm mouth against the cold, dead mouth of the child and breathed into it. He pressed his warm body against the cold body of the child from head to foot, and the child began to grow warm just a little. Then Elisha prayed to God for more power, and again he stretched himself upon the child, and breathed into its mouth. The child sneezed seven times, and opened his eyes. Then Elisha said to Gehazi, who was waiting just outside, "Call the child's mother." And she came, and Elisha said to her: "Take up thy son, for he is alive again." Thankfully the woman bowed at Elisha's feet, and then she took her son and went out, down into the part of the house where she lived. The heart of the mother had been comforted in that "chamber of peace." Christian mothers in these days do not have their little ones restored to them in this way, but in God's own time they will have them just as surely.

Illustration and Application

Life behind religious forms "eternal life" that defies death, is the one great lesson of this story; but there are other very practical lessons that may be touched by the way as steps leading up to the chamber of peace, where Elisha's success, in contrast to Gehazi's failure to raise the child, and the child's return to life from death, should receive our chief attention.

1. The Neglected Grace of Hospitality. Busy Americans, hurrying into the cities where homes are often overcrowded, have almost forgotten that hospitality, which means entertaining strangers, that is, others than relatives, is enjoined, illustrated, and rewarded all through the Bible. Abraham and Sarah, in the exercise of the usual hospitality of Orientals to all strangers, "entertained angels unawares," and their home was gladdened with the child of promise in consequence, as was the lowly home in Shunem also, which has given the world the beautiful term and association of "the prophet's chamber." It will be answered by the cynical that many, who even in Sunday School convention or conference time, have "entertained strangers," have entertained ungrateful people. But these abuses of hospitality do not excuse us for not rightly using "this grace." Indeed, in Christ's picture of the judgment day, the neglect of it is one of the chief indictments of the condemned: "I was a stranger, and ye took me not in." Especially to lonely youth away from home should we exercise "this grace," and the Sunday School, by its class groups, affords to tactful Christians rare opportunities to illustrate the Endeavor motto for this branch of Christian work, "social to serve." An "annual class sociable," with a costly spread is not enough. The plain supper the Y. M. C. A. serve every Sunday evening to young men away from home is far better. But neither of these will take the place of a more personal hospitality for old and young, of which Jesus shall say, as if it had been done to himself: "I was a stranger, and ye took me in."

2. A Helpful Child. The child of promise that God gave to the childless family in Shunem as a reward of their generous hospitality to the prophet, we learn, incidentally, was a helpful child, for it was while he was farming with his father that he was fatally sunstruck. There is no special significance in the sunstroke. The picture we wish to recall is the boy working beside his father, which should be set before the many lazy and ungrateful boys and girls who are so unwilling to work for kind fathers and mothers, that their parents prefer to do the child's proper work rather than work harder in making them do it, which they nevertheless ought to do, for there is nothing but trouble ahead for both parents and children when the latter are not early trained to do their share of the world's work. The happiest children are those who insist on helping, and as a consequence find half as much playtime twice as pleasant.

In London, a father told his boy Henry to meet him on London Bridge at noon, but he forgot all about the appointment. When he got home in the evening he said to his wife, "Where is Henry?" She replied, "He went to meet you early in the day, and has not come back." "Why," said the father, "he must be waiting for me on London Bridge. I promised to meet him there at 12 o'clock. I told him to wait for me if I was not there at that hour, but I forgot all about it." It was now late in the evening. The father put on his overcoat to go in search of the lad. He lived a long way from London, and it was past midnight when he reached the bridge. Sure enough, there stood the brave boy, shivering with the cold. He had been trained to do what his father commanded, whether to work or wait. He would not move away, although cold and tired, because his father's last words on parting had been: "Wait there for me, my boy, till I come." That boy became the great Christian soldier, Sir Henry Havelock. Obedience to parents is an essential of true success.

3. A Mother's Love. From the lowest to the highest forms of life, motherhood stands for the unselfish love of life. Mr. Frank Bullen, who was once a whaler, tells a touching story about one of these mother whales who died while protecting her young. He was close by in the bay when the mother whale was struck by the harpoon. Instead of swimming away or diving down into the sea, the mother whale took no more notice of the piercing blow of the harpoon than if she had never been touched. Close nestled to her side was a youngling of not more than five days old, which sent up its baby spout every now and then about five feet into the air. One long, wing-like fin embraced its mother's body, holding it close to the massive breast of the tender mother, whose only care seemed to be to protect her young, utterly regardless of her own pain and danger. If sentinels were ever permitted to interfere with such operations, might well have done so, for while the calf continued to struggle to escape from the enfolding fin, making all sorts of puny struggles in the attempt, the mother scarcely moved from her position, although streaming with blood from a score of wounds. So in the most perfect quiet, with scarcely a writhing, nor any sign of flurry, she died, holding the calf to her side till the last vital spark had fled. This picture imperfectly represents the suffering brave mother-love of our own homes. Let not boys and girls miss the point of the baby whale foolishly struggling to get away from its mother's protecting grasp. "Tied to its mother's apron string" it was indeed, and in that was its safety, till mother died. Every restraint that an intelligent Christian mother or father puts on a child is to protect it from hazards of physical and moral peril. Let us not foolishly break from such loving protection.

4. The Power of Character. This is the greatest lesson in this story—the failures of Gehazi as comforter and life restorer, even with Elisha's staff in hand, in contrast to Elisha's success in both, showing that the man behind the message, the man behind the staff, is the important thing, as in war it is "the man behind the gun." It is not a religious form that saves, but the life behind it; not a sacrament, but the Spirit; not the broken bread and wine, but the Christlike life of self-sacrifice; not "joining the church," but being really joined to Christ as the branch to the vine, so that his unselfish life flows through us and comes out in daily fruitfulness. As Gehazi went to comfort the woman who instinctively refused to confide in him, as he subsequently went with Elisha's staff to save the child, which she instinctively saw would be in vain because he was a worldly, selfish, covetous man, though engaged in religious work with Elisha, so the unsaved instinctively reject, often with scorn, invitations to become Christians when they come from uninspired Church members.

A drummer was often urged by his Christian wife to become a Christian. Her life was right, and he envied it, but he said, "No one can be a Christian and sell goods on the road." Whenever she pointed him to some faithful Christian merchant or lawyer, he would say, "But he isn't in my business. He could not be a Christian if he was a commercial traveler." At last she saw a "drummer" at another church of the town passing the plate as a church officer. Exultantly she reported the fact. "There! I last I have found a Christian in your business." "I am a Christian!" said the husband scornfully, "Why here is a wad of bills in my pocket now that I won from him cards as we came in on the train yesterday." Such a Gehazi can have no power to save others. And when the card winnings are "prizes," the case is the same. A mother given to bridge whist and progressive euchre showed her son a beautiful silver cup she had won. Quickly he said, "And I won twenty-five dollars myself yesterday at poker." Strange that a company of Christian women cannot enjoy each others' fellowship a few hours without the intrusion of our national passion for commercialism. It is not only gambling but bad manners to drag money-making into our parlors. It is far worse than "talking shop." A further illustration of modern Gehazis, who with the staff of a religious profession have no power to comfort and save, is found in a subsequent chapter of that drummer's life. He did finally become a church member, perhaps to please his wife, but in any case it "did not take" hold of his real life. He was a "professing," but not a possessing Christian. During a revival, however, he started down the church aisle on request to invite sinners to the altar. He spoke to one of his lady friends, with whom he had often danced and played cards. She replied scornfully: "You want me to be a Christian! Such a Christian as you are, I suppose." He then upon went to the "penitent form" himself, convicted of his own need, as Gehazi was not, and when he had gotten right himself, became a great soul-winner.

A preacher had been discussing amusements with a young man who said he could be as useful a Christian with dancing and card playing as without it. Finally the pastor put a text which the failures of Gehazi recall. He said: "Now if you were dying and wanted some one to come and comfort you and pray with and for you, would you send for some church member you dance with or play cards with?" He hesitated a moment, and then replied: "To speak frankly and truly, I would send for none of them. I should want one of you kind, that finds his pleasure rather in doing good."

IN THE SHADE OF THE VINE

BY MARGARET E SANGSTER

An Over-Strenuous Housewife

HIRAM DODD came slowly across the lot, weary after a hard day's work felling trees. The man was somewhere on the hither side of fifty, tough and gnarled as a hard knot, his face brown and weather-beaten. There was about him something like a gray autumn day when the winds are all, a sort of quiet, meditative look, touched with a certain brooding sadness. Occasionally a smile struggled through the gloom and then the man's countenance changed and was illuminated, and the effect was very different from that produced when a shaft of sunlight rifts the overhanging clouds.

Such a smile overspread his face when little Lucy ran out to meet her father. The youngest, seven, she was his special darling, and did with him whatever he pleased.

"Pick me up, daddy," she commanded, and he lifted her to his shoulder.

"Now we will march three times around the house, and then march in," she ordered, with a touch of despotism.

Hiram began his march. Tired as he was, Lucy's plump form did not seem to him a burden. Her clasped arms around his neck, she stole away some of the day's care. Presently Mrs. Hiram Dodd came to the door. She was a tall woman, with snapping black eyes and thin lips, a woman like a knife-blade for sharpness, and as cool as a snowflake from neck to toe in her blue print gown.

"Did I ever see such folly?" she exclaimed shrilly. "Hiram, put her down this instant. Lucy, don't you know your father is tired? There, man, wipe your feet. Your shoes are caked with dirt. You have brought dirt into my kitchen."

"Not much, mother," he said, with a propitiatory glance.

"Not much! Enough to need broom and dustpan, when I'm tired I could drop in my tracks. Oh, you needn't fancy anybody's tired but yourself. Working in the woods with a good luncheon of cold meat and bread and cake and pie is enough to make a man feel easier than toiling over a hot stove from morning until night, and never getting rid of mess and litter. Lucy Dodd, is that your doll that I see on the porch? Go and put the doll away, or I'll lock her up in the closet. What's that you say, Hiram, that I'm not to scold Lucy? I'm not going to spoil Lucy as you do. You got her to bring up, and if I ever say a word to you fly right off the handle."

All this went on in a sort of breathless, torrent-like fashion, Mrs. Dodd stepping briskly to and fro, setting the table for supper. As they sat down, she observed suddenly on a window-pane and jumped nimbly from her chair to pounce on it, and when again seated, she was able to eat in peace on account of discovering a minute crack in the lid of the blue tea-pot.

"Mary," remonstrated the husband, "why are you so restless? You are wearing yourself out over trifles. For once let us have a meal without your losing your patience over mere nothings."

"Do you call a fly nothing?" she answered. "I hate flies like poison."

"Well, but they are almost gone, dear. Do keep still for five minutes."

The older children were at the table. They were too well trained to comment on their mother, but their faces betrayed sympathy with their father. Privately

Ned nudged Sammy, and Ellen confided in a whisper to Martha, that "mother was cross."

It was a pity. There was a beautiful home, with every element needed for contentment, all spoiled by the frantic, pin-wheel activities of an over-strenuous housekeeper. Better a little superficial dirt than cleanliness carried to too great an excess.

Little Deeds of Love

Little acts of kindness, little deeds of love, as the familiar hymn puts it, make our earth an Eden, like the heaven above.

Among the little acts of kindness that cost only a little thought, may be numbered the sending a paper that you have read to some one else who will enjoy it, or a flower from your garden to the friend who is ill.

THE "HERMIT WELL" AT PIERMONT-ON-THE-HUDSON, N. Y.

This is a pure spring flowing out of the heart of the rock; its waters ever cold, and its refreshment ever ready for man and beast. It is one of Nature's wonders, and recalls the days of old, when, in a far land of the East, Moses smote the rock, and the living stream gushed forth.

Here shall the weary quench their thirst and onward fare, Nor have a fear from year to year, beneath their Father's care.

"There is very little I can do," said a sweet young girl, "but I sometimes amuse Mrs. E's children, while she goes to a missionary meeting. Unless somebody comes to her relief, she can never go anywhere in these days, with three babies under four years of age!"

The tiny acts of thoughtfulness, the sitting with a forlorn old lady in the dusk and listening to her stories of the past, the picking up dropped stitches, and saying cheering words, are not so very much in themselves, but they are acknowledged by the Lord who says, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these little ones, ye have done it unto me!"

Don't Be Mulish!

Some of us prize very highly a quality that we imagine is firmness, and are inclined to be boastful that when we take a stand, nobody can persuade us to change our base.

"This rock shall fly, as soon as I," is our declaration. Friends, nine-tenths of the ultra-firm people, are simply shockingly and abominably mulish. They want their own way. Obstinacy and firmness have little in common. The first is the bulwark of a weak and vain character; the second is the outgrowth of strength and devotion to principle. But do not let us mistake the one for the other. Mulishness is as provoking in a man as in a beast.

A Word Regarding Extravagance

TO those of us who are accustomed carefully to treasure a single black silk or other good dress, and to trim over our hats and bonnets from season to season, the extravagance of certain fashionable women is a never-ending puzzle. One of the New York papers the other day announced that a certain firm had obtained a judgment against a lady who had purchased, without settling her bill, a variety of beautiful things. Among the articles mentioned were no less than nineteen hats, ordered between September and December of last year. There was a fur coat valued at nearly eight hundred dollars; another, with a muff to match, that had cost over six hundred; a mantle approximating nine hundred; a skirt at twelve hundred dollars, and various other articles and items of luxury, any one of which would go far toward the support of an ordinary family for a period of some weeks or months. The lady in question was, it appeared, a woman of large wealth, the wife of one very rich man and the sister of another, a woman with no occasion to be frugal. Why she did not pay her bill was not explained. Nor does it concern outsiders. The question as to the propriety of leaving bills unsettled indefinitely, is easily answered. No excuse can be given for it; it is often very cruel, as the custom of carrying long accounts with wealthy patrons lands many a firm in bankruptcy.

But the critic exclaims at the wasteful expenditure, and indeed it hardly seems right that one woman should have nineteen hats, while another, equally admirable, has to get along with one or two at a time. Yet we must remember, that it took the labor of a number of people to make the nineteen hats. Every so called extravagance sets in motion a good many wheels and employs a good many hands, and the little hearth-fires of the poor are lighted from the blaze on the hearth of the rich.

There is another view which it is impossible to ignore. Always around us there are human needs and human suffering. In every city where the ladies on the stately avenue are arrayed like the lilies of the field, there are women and children, not a few, who perish of hunger; who are ill, and have not the wherewithal to go to pleasant country places where they might get well; who sit down in squalor and want, and have no helper.

Many are generous and the benefactions of the rich, but these benefactions are probably not often made by the class who are irresponsible enough to run up large obligations, and thoughtless enough not to pay them when presented. For this sort of action is distinctly and shamefully selfish, and selfishness has no room to be charitable.

—ANNIE. Your question as to the meaning of Luke 12: 48, was referred by me to one who is skilled in interpreting the Scriptures. He answers: "The passage lays down the just and logical principle that responsibility is measured by knowledge. The more a man knows of God's will, the more will be expected of him. This principle would naturally apply to the heathen. Some theologians, however, object to carrying it so far, on the ground that it is explicitly applied in the passage to servants; that is, to persons like Paul, who, before his conversion, persecuted the church, thinking he was doing God service." As to your inquiry about one or two amusing games now in vogue, I see no harm in them. The righteous life of a Christian is not mere asceticism. To do justly, to love mercy, to walk humbly before God, covers the rule of Christian living.

ASTRONOMY OF THE BIBLE

ARTICLE IV.—THE STARRY HEIGHTS . . . BY PROF. LEWIS SWIFT, F.R.A.S.

"Behold the height of the stars, how high they are?" Job 22:12

HOW high are they? This is a question often asked and always has been, but Omnipotence only can answer. The severest problem man ever attempted to grapple with, is to measure the distances of some of the brighter stars, but with all the enormous efforts which for centuries astronomers have worked at the problem, with the most powerful telescopes yet made, aided by the spectroscopic and photographic camera, we have ascertained, and roughly at that, the distance of one star only.

This star is Alpha Centauri, a first magnitude star in the constellation of the Centaur. In our age it is too far south to be seen from the Northern States. I have seen it from Southern California and from Florida. Its distance in round numbers is computed to be twenty-four billion miles—24 million million, 24 with twelve ciphers attached. The attempt to conceive of such a distance would be as futile as the effort to form an idea of space without an end, or of God without a beginning. By a few computations and comparisons, I desire to impress on the minds of my readers a few facts that they may test the truth of, if they desire, by solving the problems submitted. To count 24,000,000,000,000 at the rate of 4 a second, and 10 hours a day, would take over 450,000 years. And to reach our nearest stellar neighbor at 40 miles an hour, would take an express train nearly 70 million years, and to count the fare at 2 cents a mile, at the rate of 3 dollars a second, and 10 hours a day, would take the ticket agent over 12,000 years. I will leave to the reader to ascertain what the fare would be, and how many tons in silver dollars it would weigh.

A moment's reflection on the above data will arouse in the most careless reader the question: If Alpha Centauri, a first magnitude star, and on the supposition that the fainter stars the more distant, how much further must be many thousands just visible to the naked eye, and how much further still the countless millions seen only by glimpses in the clearest, darkest night, by our mammoth telescopes, to say nothing of the many thousand millions beyond the telescope's utmost grasp, depicted on the negative photographic plate, with an exposure of 15 to 20 hours, recording stars probably from ten to twenty times as far as in the largest telescope, appearing like minute atoms of diamond dust floating in the sunbeam?

O rack me not to such extent
These distances belong to thee,
The earth's too little for thy tent,
A grave too big for me.

Light, nature's swiftest messenger, moving at the rate of 186,300 miles or seven and a half times around the earth in a second, requires four years to reach us from Alpha Centauri. If it takes this star's light so long, how many thousands of years must the light that depicted themselves on the negative plate, been rushing through space to make a record of their existence?

How came Job to know that the stars are high? Is it not wonderful, that when the Bible indulges in an astronomical thought, it is always in accordance with the strictest deductions of modern science?

It was Herschel, the mighty Nimrod of astronomy, who hunted the sky over, and first cast the plumb-line into the depths of unfathomable space, and endeavored to measure the scale on which the universe is built. The problem then was, and still is, too great for human genius to solve.

Thus far, less than a dozen stars have roughly yielded up this secret, and told us how high they are in light years.

Alpha Centauri ,	4 years to reach the earth.
Sirius ,	10 " "
Sirius, Dog Star ,	22 " "
Pole Star ,	48 " "
Capella ,	70 " "

When I look up to the pole star, the celestial lighthouse of the northern hemisphere, and reflect that its pale twinkling light left its fiery home forty-eight years ago, moving 11,150,000 miles every minute, excites emotions too deep for human speech to utter. Though our pole star now, it has not always been a pole star, nor will it always be. When Noah was sailing in his ark, Alpha Draconis was pole star, which the Bible (Job 26:7), calls the "outstretched north, over the empty place."

These determinations of distances are the best available now, but I advise the reader to receive them as probably wide of the mark. I copy them to awaken, if possible, a keener appreciation of the text, "Behold the height of the stars how high they are," and the marvelous power God has given to man, to reveal in scenes one would suppose belonged only to Omnipotence to know.

That the distances of the planets from the earth may be thoroughly impressed on the mind, I submit a few more comparisons with distances that are known. It has been ascertained that electricity moves on the telegraph wires at the rate of about 16,500 miles a second. Therefore, to telephone to an imaginary inhabitant in the moon, would require but fourteen seconds; to one on the sun, one and a-half hours; to Neptune, the most distant planet from the sun, two days, and to Alpha Centauri, forty-six years, or ninety-two to get the reply.

All the stars are in motion, some toward us, some from us, some to the right, and others to the left, going we know not where. Our sun, which is a star to other stellar systems, is going with the rest. The spectroscopic has determined its velocity to be twelve and one-half miles a second, in the direction of Beta Lyrae. The Bible speaks of wandering stars, but how did the writer know that they all were in motion? The apparent motions of the most rapid, can only be detected in a year by the most delicate instruments.

The subjoined tables comprise a small number of stars with rates of motion in the line of sight, as determined by the spectroscopic.

Stars moving from the earth	Castor 25 miles a second
	Alpha Leonis . . . 15 " "
	Beta Orionis . . . 15 " "
Stars moving towards the earth	Pollux 60 " "
	Arcturus 55 " "
	Alpha Lyrae . . . 50 " "
	Dea Star 31 " "

The stars are divided into several classes, as single, our sun being an example, double, triple, quadruple, variable, temporary, and binary; the latter again into telescopic and spectroscopic binaries. A binary is a double star physically connected, the pair or set, if more than two, revolving round the centre of gravity of each in equal periods, ranging from 11.48 years, the shortest, Delta Equulei, to twelve years, 700 years, and Epsilon Lyrae, about 2,000 years. That the sky should be covered with suns revolving around each other, and planets like ours undoubtedly revolving around each, on which people like ourselves are doubtless dwelling, having shining in their sky one, and then two, sometimes three suns shining at the same time, awakens not a few tremendous thoughts.

Telescopic binaries, seen only with the telescope, have long been known, but that there should be several hundred double and triple stars not visible as such through the most powerful telescopes, but revealed by the little spectroscopic, is a new fact in astronomy.

That self-luminous stars should vary in brightness, as many do—some through wide limits, even to periodical extinction—is one of the marvels in which astronomy deals so largely. The shortest spectroscopic binary known is Mu Scorpii = 35 hours, and shortest variable is Omega Centauri, 6 hours and 12 minutes.

Many of the binary and trinary stars have borrowed sunbeam tints. We often see a blue star revolving round a yellow one, and a green one around a red one. The sky is covered with marvels which cannot be appreciated till seen, and when we roam over it with our great telescopes, and suns by millions sail across its crystal glass, how natural is it to ask, can any of those shining worlds be the Christian's final home, where sorrow never lives nor happiness never dies? Alas, dear reader, how little we know what the Almighty has in store for us when life's last sun goes down in the West to rise for us no more.

"THE BLACK SHEEP"

A Mother's Prayers Answered in the Bowery Mission

ADOLY couple in Scotland had a large family of sons and daughters. Every means was employed, and every possible sacrifice was made by which these children might obtain a good education, and when the father died, the widowed mother had the satisfaction of knowing that, at any rate, that the prime ambition of the breadwinner's family had been attained. One son was established in a good practice as a surgeon, another as a LL.D., and all were thoroughly trained for the struggle of life. Above everything else, they were all safely within the fold of the Good Shepherd, all were earnest active Christians—except one, the black sheep.

It seemed strange that there should be this exception, but so it was. Early in life this son took to drinking, and notwithstanding the restraints and wholesome influences of the pious family circle, he soon became a confirmed drunkard. Stranger still, that after being a godly young woman, and after losing the father of two fine children, he became even more reckless and dissipated. He went from bad to worse, lost one situation after another, and ten years ago came to me, in the hope of ridding himself of his vicious associations, and thus redeeming himself. His wife and little ones joined in prayer, and then followed a more disastrous penance than ever.

It is not difficult for him at first to obtain means, for he was exceedingly clever in his business—that of a landscape gardener. But the position after another was lost through him. His home, whenever he had one (for he was over, he sold his furniture in order to satisfy his craving for drink), became a hell. His wife was broken-hearted. His children were afraid of him. He had become a little whiskey fiend. Often, in a pure rage, he would overturn the supper table, dash the dishes that his patient wife had neatly spread for him. It seemed as though drink had permanently shattered his intellect, as well as having destroyed all sense of decency and manliness.

At last, in Scotland, however, the widowed mother had been unceasing in her prayers for the lost wanderer.

Dr. Morrey and Mr. Alexander were holding one of their great revival meetings in the Scotch city. Mr. Alexander had distributed a leaflet from Mr. Hadley's book, "Do in Water Street," entitled, "The Love of God." It was the story of a drunkard's redemption. A new hope sprang up in the mother's heart. It gave her a fresh inspiration in her prayers. Latterly, whilst making her petitions for her sons and daughters, she came to the "black sheep," all she could say was, "Alec! Alec!" and then her prayer choked with a sob.

Now new and mighty prayers came from the depths of the mother's soul. And they were answered. Not exactly as she expected, but. It was to the Bowery Mission his prayers were directed. His wife and little ones were away from him. He was wandering in the Bowery, when the bulletin at the mission door attracted him. He entered. The place was packed to the door. He was taken by an usher and led to a place near the platform. The first hymn he listened to was one the music of which was written by the lamented organist, Victor Benke, and which is always sung with tremendous power by Bowery men. The words were:

Jesus redeemed, and made me whole,
I can forget him never;
Out of the depths he brought my soul,
Now I am his for ever.

For the first time in many years his eyes were opened. He saw himself as he really was. "I cried to God," as he said himself, in his own expressive way, "with a loud voice." God heard him. His mother's prayers were answered. What a transformation has taken place in his life, only those who have been very near to him during the past twelve months can understand; and especially those who attended his anniversary meeting the other evening.

It seemed impossible for him to obtain employment. His character was completely gone. None of his former employers would have anything to say to him. God was testing him. Well has he stood the test; and now brighter days are evidently in store for him. His wife and children are with him once more. The family altar is re-erected. He has found a suitable position on the estate of one of the wealthiest and best of America's Christian women.

On the occasion of his anniversary he related the following incident:

He said: "I went out into the country, determined to find work. I did not succeed, and for three days and three nights had not a bite to eat. On the third night, lying on the ground, I caught sight of the stars above my head. When I came to think of Christ and Gethsemane, I was thrilled through and through to think of my kinship to him in suffering, and hungry and worn out as I was, I cried out, 'Lord, I am thine, take me as I am.' I knew then that God had something for me to do. Next morning I was attracted to a farmhouse. There a good old lady gave me a little work to do—the pruning of her grape-vine. When supper-time came she called me in, and while taking my supper I became conscious that she was watching me very narrowly. Suddenly, she said, 'Are you a Christian man?' 'Yes,' I replied. 'Then how does it happen that you are not in a better position?' I then told her the story of my life. With tears in her eyes, she made me acquainted with the fact that she, too, had a wandering boy somewhere. Ten years ago he had left home, and she had never seen him since. And we knelt together, the mother and I, and we prayed for him. And before I left I sat down at the little organ in her parlor, and sang to her the same Benke song that had touched my own heart eight months before:

Jesus redeemed, and made me whole.

And then I knew why God had brought me there. It was to comfort a sorrowing mother's heart, and to give strength to a mother's prayers."
J. H. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent of the Bowery Mission.

A Mountain Industrial Home

A NEW movement has just been started at Marionville, Mo., known as the Purity Industrial Home. The founder, Chas. Mitchell, believes that impurity is our great curse, and that parents, as a usual thing, do not teach their children the most correct and valuable truths, but leave them to pick up information from the vilest sources. He believes that the subject ought to be taught in a simple, to-the-point way. The young men in this Home are added against whiskey, tobacco, and are required to attend lectures and read books on purity. So far, they have been hearty in their appreciation of the subject.

The Industrial feature of the Home, provides work to pay school expenses. The inmates are given fixed wages per hour, and allowed to work out what they need. The past year forty-three men have been helped, ten of whom had to make their entire living at the Home. Under the care of the excellent matron, a deaconess, they do their own cooking, washing, ironing, etc.; they also learn barbering, printing, sewing, carpentering, farming, blacksmithing, gardening, and making axe-handles and brooms. This year they are cultivating acres of land. Last winter they undertook the task of clearing five acres of timber, pulling the trees up by the roots with a chain puller. The students would rise at four o'clock to grind axes and mattocks, and start out to the clearing, a mile and a-half away.

CHAS. A. MITCHELL

The first member of the "Industrial Family," Lester Howard, went through the Marionville Collegiate Institute, with which the Home is connected; then spent three years in a higher college, and now expects to spend two years at Harvard. This movement enabled him to get an education, and he testifies that the purity feature has been invaluable, and has transformed his life.

Another case was that of Edward McCoy, who came from a part of the wildest portion of the Ozark Mountains, with but five dollars, and he earned every cent of his expenses for three years. Learning the broom trade, he became overseer of the factory, finally leaving the school with forty dollars to attend a higher institution. He would saw wood, dig a ditch, make brooms, or do any kind of work. Before he left, he instructed another boy in the broom factory, who took charge; this boy likewise instructing another one before leaving. One very interesting case was that of a young man who used whiskey and tobacco, profanity and cards. He attended one of the White Cross meetings, and heard a talk on purity. This so convinced him, that he burned his cards and tobacco, and in a few weeks signed the pledge; later was converted, joined the Church, and is now a successful preacher.

Plans are now complete for the erection of a two-story factory, and for a Home for girls, and for acquiring a farm. The Home is located in the Ozark Mountain region.

$29 Saved. Interim Edition

A new and revised edition of Ridpath's History of the World, brought down to the Midsummer of 1904, was published in August. 100 sets were bound before we realized that another edition, with additional matter to cover the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese War, must be issued at once. In fact, it is now in the hands of the type-setters. So these 100 sets—the Interim Edition as it were, i.e., the edition down to midsummer, 1904—must be sold at what they will bring before the new edition is out. A. T. Stewart used to say, when you have a loss to make, "Make it now." Adopting his plan, we offer these brand new sets of a new edition at exactly the price we have been getting for second-hand damaged sets, and on little monthly payments, if you choose.

Compare the Russo-Japanese War with Other Great Wars

Read how a handful of Americans swept through Mexico, capturing walled cities and fortified passes, routing entrenched armies five times their number, never losing a battle, until barely six thousand tired men entered the seemingly impregnable city of Mexico, defended by thirty thousand "Descendants of Cortez and the Spanish heroes of the sixteenth century." Read of Hannibal crossing the Alps, of Caesar and his historic march to the North, subduing the Gauls, of Alexander the Great conquering the world, of William the Conqueror, Washington, Napoleon, Wellington, Gordon, Nelson, Farragut, Grant, Lee, Sherman, and the other great men of history.

The Only World's History That Reads Like a Story Book, Yet Is Recognized As a Standard Authority

John Clark Ridpath, LL.D., conceded to be the greatest modern historian, spent a lifetime in writing it. The publishers have spent over half a million dollars producing it. It is the only complete and authentic story of this world of ours from the beginning of man-life down to the present time. Every nation, ancient, medieval, modern, is adequately treated. Every fact of history worth remembering is clearly and truthfully told. Full indexes enable you to turn to any subject or incident. These indexes make it an Encyclopedia of History from the dawn of civilization down to the siege of Port Arthur and the nomination of Parker and Roosevelt. If $29 is worth more to you than the history of the last 60 days, sign and send the coupon to-day, lest you be too late.

A New Set at the Price of a Second-Hand One

Ridpath's History of the World is a great big set of nine royal octavo volumes, containing many maps and color-plates and thousands of illustrations. The complete set is sent on approval. You pay nothing until you have examined the books, then in small monthly payments, if you choose.

PERSONAL INFLUENCE*

FROM the beginning of Christianity to the present time, personal influence has been a most mighty, effective power in the propagation of the faith. Even when the preacher has done his work and the Holy Spirit has applied his words to the heart, it has frequently been the personal influence of some friend which has drawn the seeking soul over the obstacles in its path, into the kingdom. Still more frequently it is personal influence which prompts the initial step, and brings the careless sinner under the sound of the Gospel message. Some direct appeal, some earnest word or letter, the example of some noble life, has started the sinner on his search for salvation. Take away personal influence from the Gospel armory and we lose the force which has won, and is yet to win, its grandest triumphs.

It is a force every one can use. There is no one so isolated that he has no friend whom he can try to bring to Christ. Perhaps there may be many whose silence on the subject is causing surprise to those about them. They may be saying or thinking that if religion does for a man all that is claimed for it, it is strange that no effort has been made by the man who professes it to impart the knowledge to them. Unhappily, the inference is too often drawn from such silence, that the value of religion is exaggerated, and so a suspicion is produced that all the preaching fails to eradicate.

It is a force that Christ expects every one of his followers to use. We have no right to leave the propagation of the faith to ministers. It is too huge a task for them. Working with them, co-operating in their labors, we multiply their influence, and we share in their reward. When Christ saves a man, he does not do it for himself alone. The saved man becomes a servant, a messenger, a living testimony. Failing in that, one purpose of his salvation is missed. The generations multiply, and there is no way of filling the gaps in the ranks, and extending the kingdom among the newcomers, than for every man who bears the name of Christian to seek out and win another.

Behold the Lamb. A minister in New York relates that a man who had been known for his irreligious life, presented himself as a candidate for admission to church-fellowship. The minister was

*Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, the Epworth League, and Baptist Young People's Union, for Oct. 16. John. 1:35-39.

Called Higher

Helen B. Wyman passed from this life at Deming, New Mexico, on April 17, 1904. The sweet resignation of this happy child, who had known naught but the joys of earth, has made a remarkable impression upon all who knew her story. She did not seem very ill. Life looked very bright for her, and she had scarcely ever known sickness. But the doctor found a fatal leak in the heart. Just before the end she asked, "Am I dying?" "Yes, Helen," said mamma, "you are dying. You are not afraid to die, are you, darling?" "No," answered she, "I am not afraid to die." Then, after a moment's thought, "Yes, I am dying, and I am going up to God." Thus, in perfect trust and peace, her spirit passed on.

The Rev. William H. Littell died suddenly on Aug. 6, at Setauket, L. I. He had been in poor health for several months. For more than a quarter of a century he was pastor of the Setauket Church. He was born at Summit, N. J., May 2, 1840. He was graduated at Princeton College in June, 1863, and entered the Theological Seminary in September of that year. Graduating from the Seminary in April, 1867, he was licensed the previous October by the Presbytery of Elizabeth in the church at New Providence, N. J., in which he was baptized in childhood, and read to full membership at fifteen years of age. He was ordained as an evangelist by the same Presbytery and in the same church on June 3, 1867, and dismissed to the Presbytery of Burlington, where he labored for one year in the Jersey pines. He was dismissed to the Presbytery of Long Island and received by them at Huntington on September 9, and was installed pastor October 28, 1868. He was married Dec. 2, 1869, to Miss Julia B. Brown, of Newark, N. J., who has been a good helpmate to him in his long pastorate. His wife and four children survive him. On Aug. 10, 1904, 600 people were present at the funeral services held in the Presbyterian church at Setauket. The front of the church was banked with flowers, the platform being almost hidden from view. Mr. Littell was an honorary member of the Junior O. U. A. M. Six of these members acted as pall-bearers. Twelve clergymen and the elders of the church led the procession up the aisles. Addresses were given by Rev. Mr. Craven, of Mattituck. The Rev. Dr. Webster, formerly of Port Jefferson, and the Rev. Mr. Allen, formerly of Middle Island. The interment was in the family plot near the church.

delighted, and after examining him was satisfied that he was really converted. As he had been preaching a special course of sermons to outsiders, he concluded that the man had been brought to Christ under them, and asked him which it was that had led him to seek Christ. "None of them," was the reply. "I was first led to seek him by the example of a man who works at the next bench to me in the shop. He was always so happy and cheerful and contented, that I wondered what he had, that I had not. He was an extremely shy, quiet man, who seemed to have a difficulty in expressing his thoughts. But one day he said to me, 'I wish you knew my Divine Master; he would give you a peace you have never known.' It was that remark, just a pointing me to Christ that set me seeking."

They followed Jesus. A lecturer uses the following illustration of the power of influence: "I had mislaid a quantity of steel filings. I searched everywhere for them, but unsuccessfully. I knew they must be in a certain cabinet, and thinking they might have been mixed with other specimens I passed a magnet over various heaps, but they did not respond. Looking more carefully I noticed several large sheets of blotting-paper at the bottom of one of the drawers. I lifted them and underneath were my filings, scattered about. I had only to pass my magnet over them, to gather them all." That is what we have to do with our friends. They would respond to Christ's influence if there was nothing in the way. If we remove the obstruction, they would come to Christ.

Come and see. "I do not believe," said a scoffer, talking with a Christian on board a ship, "that Christianity has done so much for the world as is claimed for it." The ship soon afterwards touched at the Fiji Islands. "Now," said the Christian, "I made no reply to your statement about Christianity, but I want you to come ashore." He went, and found the people orderly, friendly and contented. The captain of the ship was with the visitors and he said: "If you had come here before the missionaries came, you would not have been entertained at the dwellings of the natives, but would have been killed and cooked for their meal." The object lesson of a changed life is often the most effectual argument a Christian can use. Every man whose life is changed is a testimony to the power of Christ.

The Wiser Way

"A merry heart doeth good like a medicine."

If thy friend is sad and weary,
Rest him for a while.
If his way is dark and dreary,
Light it with a smile.
Let some helpful word be spoken,
Give a tender, loving token,
It may cheer a heart that's broken,
And its grief beguile.

Like a medicine that healeth
By its subtle art,
Is the sunny ray that stealeth
From a merry heart.
As the song of some sweet bird
Holy memories oft hath stirred,
So a kind and hopeful word
Will its strength impart.

Thou canst lessen pain and sorrow,
Lessen it by half,
By the magic thou canst borrow
From a happy laugh.
Let thy light shine full and free,
Bid the darksome shadows flee,
Till the sad ones turn to thee,
As their stay and staff.

Carry, then, a face that's smiling,
With thee everywhere.
From its weariness beguiling
Many a life of care.
Soothing oft a heart of sorrow,
Teaching it some hope to borrow,
That will gild the coming morrow
With its rainbow fair.

Missionary to the Blind in China

SCHOOL OF THE EVANGELICAL HOME FOR THE BLIND, AT KAULAN, CHINA

MARTHA POSTLER, a sister of the Order of St. John, recently took her first trip to the home of her sister in Canton-on-the-Main, after eight years of rich-bleed work among the blind in China. Making this visit Sister Martha had been seriously ill, and never recovered, peacefully sleeping at her sister's home. She had again saw her beloved home in Canton-on-the-Main, nor her loved ones in China, but the faithful and blessed she rests in the shaded cemetery near her home.

She was born in 1860, and was the oldest daughter of an evangelical minister in the village of Santomischel, on the borders of Russia. She was gifted with a talent for writing, and so drew the most charming pen-and-ink sketches. She consecrated all her talents to missionary work. Only one small drawing, "The Chinese New Year's Flower," that she sent as a birthday gift to a sister in the homeland, was published. The Chinese, the people to whom she gave her heart and life, and who loved her dearly in return, sang when she decorated their houses with flowers, one of their own songs about luck. This "luck-flower" was the last greeting to her well-beloved art. When Sister Martha was dying, she left this message to be sent to those whom she had left behind, "Greet all, and say unto them, that I have been happy in life, and that I die contented."

In Hong Kong, in a rented house, Sister Martha began her work, with five blind Chinese girls, and when in June of this year she undertook her journey, she could look back at her own house at Kaulan, where forty blind girls were left with her assistant, who came to help her about three years ago. Seldom has one woman's life been so rich in good works.

A Sewing-Class in Morocco

TANGIER, Morocco, North Africa, Aug. 26. I have been keeping you safely under the shadow of his wings during these troublous times in Morocco. We have been around Tangier up to this time, but our journey among the villages has been stopped on account of the unrest among the tribes. I might call them. After tea is served, all is put to one side, and the Bible is brought out, and a Gospel story read, which is listened to with great interest, and sometimes interrupted by a crying baby, which a mother has brought with her because she could not leave it at home. All are welcome, and all receive

MRS. WEISS AND HER SEWING CLASS OF MOORISH WOMEN

It has not been in a village since the kidnapping of Mr. Perdicaris and Mr. Varley, which happened some months ago. Mrs. Weiss has an interesting class among the women who live in a village close to our home. These are some of the most needy in the neighborhood. The women come to our house once a week, and Mrs. Weiss furnishes them with cloth, with which they make themselves garments. While they are busy at their sewing, she converses, and these Gospel lessons, may prove to be the means of gradually changing the lives of some of them. After they have sewed for an hour, they are served with hot tea and bread, which they enjoy, for many of them do not have much in their own homes—if homes you might call them. After tea is served, all is put to one side, and the Bible is brought out, and a Gospel story read, which is listened to with great interest, and sometimes interrupted by a crying baby, which a mother has brought with her because she could not leave it at home. All are welcome, and all receive blessing by coming. The lame and halt, and even the partially blind, come each Friday afternoon. This is one way in which we are reaching the women of Morocco, who are usually held in such close bondage by their husbands.

Mr. Perdicaris and Mr. Varley are now somewhere in Europe, where they will remain until the conditions have become more quiet, and till it is a fit place to live in safely.

We shall leave here in about one month for America, reaching either Boston or New York in early October. I am bringing with me a young man to be educated and trained for Gospel work here among his own people.

FRED WEISS, Missionary.

You Can Play Them Without Learning

The Church Choir Zobo Band of Paterson, N. J.

Photograph by

THIS band was organized by the Church Choir and Organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary Purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient, and is now taking outside engagements. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

Read What Pastors and Organists Say About Our Instruments

G. B. Richardson, Business Manager of the "Young People's Weekly," Elgin, Ill., writes: "The Zobo Instruments I purchased for the Young People's Weekly, were just what I needed for an entertainment given at my home to the 200 employees of the 'Young People's Weekly.' Although the quartette had no experience in playing, they played the Zobo Instruments with such ease and confidence, and were voted a great success. We are now considering the organization of a full orchestra for next winter's entertainment, and I write this to ask you to forward me a select list of 12 to 15 instruments."

Wm. J. Siemers, leader of the Beacon Light Zobo Band, Baltimore, Md., writes: "I send you today copy of a Baltimore paper, containing a complimentary notice of the 'Zobo' Concert given last night by the Beacon Light Zobo Band, composed of members of the choir of the Scott Street United Brethren Church. The concert was a great success, both artistically and financially, and of the close we received an offer at good pay for another engagement. Every church should have a Zobo Band. It is the pleasantest and easiest way of raising money that I ever tried or heard of, because any one that can hum a tune can play on a Zobo."

Miss Hattie E. Kountz, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo Instruments received, and are all right, and we want more of them."

Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it, will organize a band."

Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I had the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first class, and just what we needed. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, and would say it was a complete success."

Mae Blance Winfield, instructor in music at Gallaway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments."

Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

Can Be Played By Anyone Who Can Hum a Tune—No Learning

We do away with that long, tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. An instrument capable of almost every modulation, its music may be softened to the cooling of a dove, or the thrilling song of the nightingale. The Cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual, suited for all in and outdoor entertainments. These instruments open up new possibilities to the Vocalists, and develop the vocal chords.

With a Full Band a Grand Pipe Organ Effect Can Be Obtained

Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost. Every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band. Sing into the mouthpiece—Zobo does the rest.

$1.00 SPECIAL OFFER

To introduce the musical marvel of the age and to give you a chance to test our instruments and prove all our claims, we will send the Zobo Cornet, solid brass, highly polished and lacquered, 11 inches long, 3 1/2 inch bell, with full instructions how to play, transportation charges prepaid, for $1.00. We make this offer, believing that all interested will eventually organize a Zobo Band. This is a grand offer, and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, or a bank draft payable to our order.

A WELCOME TO LARKIN

Many of the readers are patrons of the Larkin Co. of Buffalo. They will all be glad to see their advertisement in the columns again, as of yore.

No general advertising has been done by this Company for the past three years. This withdrawal was necessitated by an increase in sales that outstripped a growth of manufacturing plant which is possibly without a parallel. Advertisements have not been required to hold the continued trade of old patrons, and indeed, through their recommendation, unaided by advertising, new customers are constantly added. Nine years of continuous building-operations have increased the floor area of the Larkin Soap Works from two to twenty-nine acres and the Company can now invite new customers.

For some future issue we are promised an illustration of the Larkin Soap Works of 1904, which will graphically depict a commercial growth that is extraordinary even in America.

The McKinley Rocker offered in to-day's advertisement has itself quite a unique history, though it is but one of a hundred Larkin Premiums that are given with $10.00 purchases. Heretofore, it has been offered only to those who were already Larkin customers. It was first shown in their Premium List February 1st, 1902. Ever since, the demand has far exceeded the supply. In 1902 the necessity of erecting a factory exclusively for the McKinley Rocker was recognized, and the work was begun. One of the largest and most modern of Chair factories is now turning out two hundred of these well-made, beautifully finished and thoroughly comfortable chairs daily. All are for Larkin customers; and those who obtain one on the liberal Larkin terms, by which the Rocker is virtually a free gift, are to be congratulated.

The Chiffonier No. 5 is also so popular that a large furniture factory is confined to its production for Larkin patrons.

The Saint and Sinner Problem

THE tone of some of the communications to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, indicates the opinion that a person should be allowed his freedom to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, without having made any credible profession of faith, or avowing any intention of doing so, and that the Church has no ordinances nor advantages, which it can of right, or should, for any reason, withhold from any one. The opposite is denominated, "throwing of stones at one's neighbor," and one contributor calls it the "holier than thou process." It is impossible to satisfactorily treat this question, unless we agree upon a definition of the terms. As I understand the object of the discussion, it is to make clear whether some people have rights in the Church which others have not; whether, in any respect, the Church is for some, more than for others, and, if so, why? "Some" are saints. "Others" are sinners. Webster defines a saint to be a "godly person"; a sinner, to be "one who, having sinned, is unrepentant"; the Church, as "an organized body of Christian believers; the collective body of Christians." We now know the problem we are to solve. The question practically becomes this: Has a godly person (a saint), on earth, or in heaven, any rights in the Church here or there, which, in reason, and by the consent of Scripture, an unrepentant transgressor (a sinner), has not, and could not, in the nature of the case have?

Whether, therefore, the Church is for saints or sinners, depends upon the manner in which one views the purpose for which the Church was founded and exists. If it is only an agency for the dissemination of moral and religious principles, a social, cultural, publicly helpful institution, then it is spectacular for all to look at, admire and patronize, as it suits convenience and taste, and as it may seem that benefits accrue from such a course. In this sense there are other organizations than the Church which have for their avowed design the same general purposes; exist in the sight of, seek the approval of all who are disposed to give them countenance. But if the Church, as the Apostle Paul declares, is a spiritual household, "the house of God, the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth," then a line of demarcation is scripturally drawn between a mere agency for the public weal, and a body of people who must visibly hold in trust the truths of divine revelation, go to the world with them in order to save it, be ready and glad to have the world accept these truths and unite in their propagation. If also, as indicated by inspiration, the Church as an observable body is being added to day by day, as in Apostolic times, from those that are being saved, then it is a body which in a true sense stands by itself, the unsaved condition of another class of persons being the only wall of partition between the two. As a matter of fact, the Church is both, but the divinity of its commission is observed in the obligation and accountability laid upon it in the latter. Human in organization, it yet has a divine charge to carry out. Accordingly, it is for sinners, in that its message and privileges are freely offered to all whom Christ Jesus came to save, which means every soul on earth. It is for saints particularly, inasmuch as no earthly organization can be visible, tangible, unless it has a corporate membership, consisting of such as avow its principles, accept its risks, bear its responsibilities, hold and perpetuate its trust. These latter alone can be saints. It should be plain that only godly persons can consistently become members of a body of people who constitute the Church of God, the pillar and ground of his revealed truth for mankind.

A multitude of illustrations will occur to any thoughtful reader, in proof of the fact that the Church as a visible earthly body of Christ's disciples, differs none in these general respects from other named and recognized aggregations of individuals, who could have no separate, corporate, distinguishable existence, except for certain principles avowed and objects set forth, acceptance of which can alone entitle one to membership in them. Let me give some examples. A family is a close corporation, and its home, a spot sacred in law against encroachments by an individual not a member of it, or by the public. And yet its communal hospitalities are known and free. Imagine a stranger demanding shelter there by the year, or for life, his food, clothing, education and common support provided as his rights.

The United States is a place, and an association whose territory and citizenship privileges are solicitously open to all the world; but actually, and in good reason, dispensed to those alone who come to it, avow its principles, covenant with it, pre-empt or buy outright its lands, pay its taxes, sign its papers, and fight for it if the time comes. Such, and such alone, does the United States admit to be her very own, to be protected at home, on high seas, or in any foreign clime on earth. Do we hear complaint because the prerogatives and immunities of citizenship may be secured by those only who comply with the terms? Several great fraternal societies have their respective civic, social and moral constitutions, without acceptance of which no one may reasonably lay claim to their memberships and closest benefits, though these fraternities can have no being without dispensing some free profits to those outside their own fellowship, which, indeed, it is their glory to do.

In a similar manner we may affirm of the Church. Widely thought of, it is for all sinners. Discriminatingly considered, it is particularly for saints. Its door is as great and wide as the entreaty of Christ, who says "Come," to all. "Whosoever will, let him come." But it is also as narrow as the proscription of the same Saviour, who says: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me cannot be my disciple," and who declares again, respecting the confession of faith in Christ as the Son of God, which the Apostle Peter made: "Upon this rock I will build my Church." As a collective body, therefore, the Church cannot escape having a constituency of its own, drawn from the world of sinners, because it consists of disciples. The facts of the Bible teach that the Church is a place where, and an organization through which, we may all make our confession of faith; that it is the unit through which the multiplication of God's kingdom is effected; that it is the earthly public instrumentality through which Christians are chiefly spiritually fed; that it is pre-eminently the world-wide means for saving sinners and safeguarding them in the fold of Christ, because it is the Church which secures, prepares, and sends out proclaimers of the Gospel, of which agency alone the Scripture declares that it is the power of God unto salvation to every one who believes; The sinner must make terms with the Church, not the Church with the sinner. The Saviour's assertion is, that he who shall finally not do so, shall be to the Church as a heathen, and as a publican. This shows that the Church is for saints primarily, secondarily for sinners, they being transformed into saints in the process of conforming themselves to Christ, and to the Church as the pillar and ground of the truth.

Scripture students are familiar with these facts, and the necessary deductions from them. But there are always the young, the uneducated, the unthoughtful, the inexperienced, the untrained in either Biblical or theological accuracies, besides mistaken but well meaning and indeed pious people, for whom there must faithfully be "line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little, there a little," in order that they may be helped to straightness of thinking to rightly dividing the Word of truth. We can only finish as we began, by saying the Church is for both saint and sinner. But its saving benefits can accrue only to the saint, since he alone can and does use them. Its world-wide benignant light, tender, divine calls, gentle impulses, and sweet benedictions, fall upon sinners to the uttermost, until the day dawn and the day star arise in their hearts as disciples of the meek and lowly Jesus. They then readily enough discern that the Church is for them, as it was not and never could be while they were in any gall of bitterness, in any bond of iniquity.

A Church Built of Moss Ferns

In the little village of Mumford, in Western New York, is a church which is probably without an equal on this continent as a floral curiosity. It is built of petrified moss ferns.

THE CHURCH BUILT OF "TRIFA"

...eas, etc., and is a most interesting study. It thus described by a writer in the New York Tribune: At first glance the walls appear to be constructed of rough sandstone smeared with an outer coating of gritty, coarse plaster; but closer view reveals the error of this first conclusion. Instead of plaster the eyes behold traceries of delicate leaves, lacework of interwoven twigs, bits of broken branches, fragments of mossy bark, splinters of wood, all preserved against the wasting of time and decay by being turned into the hardest of flinty limestone. Every block of stone in the four walls is a closely cemented mass—not thrown in here and there, but literally packed and interwoven. There is no basic rock at all, but only fibres, which give the rock cohesion and strength. Nevertheless, the stones are light in weight, compared with granite and sandstone. The blocks were hewn from the petrified depths of a nearby cedar swamp.

"Mumford is situated in the heart of the great area of rock, once the bed of an ocean, known to geologists as the Niagara limestone. The water, which gushes from innumerable springs or flows in frequent brooks, is alkaline from the lime held in solution. Northeast of the village is a dense grove of cedars. The whole grove and undoubtedly the muck land are on a bed of thick white rock. Every particle of the rock's mass is made up of the petrified cedar leaves, branches, twigs, broken bark and even whole stumps and knots, welded and knit together into one dense tangle. As these parts of the trees fell, one layer upon another, they were saturated with the dampness of the swamp and with the lime held in solution. As the vegetable matter decayed and the water evaporated every line, fibre and grain was preserved by the lime sediment. The rock was sawed in blocks suitable for the masons' use, with one surface rough and broken, as it came from the quarry. This rough surface was laid outside by the builders, so that the walls of the church exhibit this ancient vegetation in rough and bold relief. In many places whole stumps set out, all of them perfectly preserved in their minutest details."

A VERY simple and pleasing picture of the Czarina's domestic life is drawn by a writer in the Courrier des Etats-Unis, of New York. He says: "The Czar finds the Empress in the apartments of the children, to whom she speaks sometimes in French, sometimes in German, rarely in Russian. She likes the French language, and wants the little Grand Duchesses Olga, Tatiana, Maria and Anastasia to cultivate it. Nicholas II. speaks French perfectly. He and the Czarina never fail to read together the literary novelties that appear in Berlin and Paris.

"The Empress detests formal receptions, although she resigns herself to them. She likes little private parties where she can prescribe luxury and ceremonies. The simplicity of the empress is painful to the ladies of honor, who are obliged to follow her example. High Russian society loves splendor, because there are many great fortunes in St. Petersburg; and pompous luxury has no chance to display itself in court except at great official receptions, when the Czarina appears in a splendid toilet, the magnificence of which produces murmurs of admiration. These receptions are usually in the Nicholas Hall of the Winter Palace. This hall is wainscoted in white and bordered by tall mirrors which reflect a thousand electric lights. All fairy scenes fade away before these official receptions, at which as many as three thousand guests are present. The Empress appears with her hundred ladies of honor, and recalls one of those visions depicted by the poets of the Orient. She smiles graciously upon all, who bow to her as she passes on. Her light velvet robe sparkles with the fire of innumerable diamonds. Over her head-dress, a marvel of art, a beautiful white bird floats with outstretched wings, with plumage bespangled with brilliants, with eyes of rubies and a beak of coral. The respect with which she is surrounded at such moments reaches the veneration point. Beauty and imperial majesty are triumphant. Precisely in that moment of fascination the Empress of Russia presents herself to the admiration of the elite of her court, like a goddess before whom the people kneel and tremble.

"But what an unsuspected contrast! When the dazzling reception is over, when these attributes of magnificence are replaced in their caskets, when the Czarina reaches her apartments where solicitude or maternal anxiety calls her, she busies herself in seeking the dishes which are best for her children."

Still Preaching at Ninety

FEW preachers of the Gospel have made such a record of long-continued service as that of the Rev. Amos Osborn, a Vermont pastor, who preached his last sermon a few

REV. AMOS OSBORN

Sundays ago, at the age of ninety, after a ministry of almost fifty years. Mr. Osborn is a native of Pittstown, N.Y., where he was born in 1814. He studied for the ministry at Boston, Mass., and was ordained about 1840. Methodism was then young, and the ministers of those early days had strenuous lives to lead. Like many co-workers, he had many towns to cover in his circuit rides. At one time during his years of service as a circuit minister, Mr. Osborn had twenty-nine churches under his charge. He married in October, 1844.

The salary of the hard-worked ministers of the early days was small, and Mr. Osborn's recompense for his difficult labors at one period, was only $375 annually. His early work in New York State was followed by work in the New England States. At one time his parish was partly in the United States and partly in Canada, the line between the two organized governments being marked by a wide swath of trees which were hewed down. The last charge he had was at Wells, Vt. Never in his long career was he moved from a parish by the wish of his congregation, and his departure was always an occasion of regret.

In his old age, his health commenced to fail and his voice gave out. He had preached while a minister over 6,000 sermons, and many of his original manuscripts are still preserved by him.

The Rev. Amos Osborn's last sermon was a dramatic one. In the congregation were people from New York, Hartford, Rockville, Manchester and Talcottville, besides the local members of the church at Manchester, Conn. At the usual time for the preaching, the congregation saw a slightly stooped, aged man, rise and walk with slow steps to the pulpit. The long hair that hung over his shoulders was as white as snow. The congregation heard a pleasant sounding voice, not one of great volume, but, nevertheless, one that could be heard distinctly at the rear of the church. The sermon was one full of advice and instruction, such as a man with almost a hundred years of experience in the world could deliver. His text was taken from Gen. 5:24: "And Enoch walked with God; and he was not: for God took him." The delivery was slow and full of earnestness.

A Telescopic Church

IN the current issue of Everybody's Magazine is the following, which will interest both pastors and parishioners:

To a church in a small Western town came a young minister, fresh from a theological college. On one bright Sabbath morning, he preached his first sermon to a crowded house. He was naturally elated at that, and, somewhat crestfallen when, on the second Sunday, his congregation was considerably smaller. On the third Sunday, his audience was not only much reduced, but it seemed to him that the church edifice itself looked smaller, much smaller.

Knowing this was impossible, he rubbed his glasses clear, and preached his sermon. On the fourth Sunday, the house of God looked like a hen-house, and, thinking he was losing his reason, he asked the sexton for particulars.

"Why, certainly," said that worthy; "this church is getting smaller every Sunday, but it is compelled to keep pace with your congregations. That is one of the conditions exacted by the philanthropist who built it some years ago."

And then the sexton took the young preacher down in the cellar, and showed him the machinery and levers that regulated the size of the church. With a simple touch of the hand he could stretch the building out like a concertina, or contract it at will. The minister caught his breath and waited for more.

"You see, it was this way," continued the sexton, "one of our rich men, with an eccentric turn, was determined that no minister should preach to empty benches in this town; so he designed a church that would fit any preacher in the country. While your congregations have been getting smaller every Sunday, you have always talked to a full house. Why, I have seen this church so small that only myself and the minister could get into it. You see, it is my business to regulate the size of the church; all you have to do is to furnish the congregation."

But the young preacher stayed to hear no more, and his suit-case was packed that night with trembling hands. As he left town the next morning, he noted that the church had resumed its normal condition; it was as big as on his arrival, and ready for another embryo Spurgeon or Beecher.

What is wanted is ministers who will keep churches from "telescoping."

Answered Prayers

Mrs. M. P., Collegeville, Pa. "I would add my thanks and acknowledgment to God for the way in which I have been helped, also for the way he has answered my prayers in relieving me from illness which I have suffered for years. I am thankful to acknowledge it to the world, hoping some one else may be benefited by reading these answers as I have been."

H. C. W. "I want to add my testimony in regard to answered prayer. I was very much troubled. I determined to make my case a matter of prayer, promising God if he would help me I would confess him. God has heard and answered me."

D. A. B., Wyoming, N.Y. "I called upon the Lord in the day of trouble, and he heard my prayer and delivered me. I am almost seventy. Many times in my long life he has heard my prayer and answered. Sometimes I have cried long, even years, but the answer came at last."

H. "I desire to acknowledge answers to prayer for dear ones, whose recovery has given great joy. I give God the glory."

G. G. C., Jamaica. "I wish to acknowledge God's great goodness to me in answering my prayers when I was in great trouble."

W. G. C., Cozaddale, Ohio. "I desire to acknowledge the goodness of God, and that he has answered many of my prayers."

M. A. T., New Jersey. "I want to acknowledge the goodness of God to me for many years in answering prayer, and also for present blessings."

Mrs. E. V. E. "I must acknowledge in answer to prayer, the great goodness of my dear Saviour in restoring my only child from severe sickness to health."

Constant Reader. "I know from experience that our dear Saviour will hear and answer prayer if we go to him with a heart full of faith. Praise his holy name."

E. B. B., Dallas, Tex. "God has not only answered my petition, but granted me an unexpressed desire. He gives us more than we ask. Praise his name."

Minnie S. D. "God has heard and helped me. I want to thank him by telling others that their faith may be strengthened as mine has been. He has heard me so many times."

Mrs. D., Montclair. "I have so much to thank God for, I want to tell it. God has restored my daughter to me, who was so very sick, and I praise his holy name."

STRANGE TIBETAN RITES

WRITING from Lhasa, the sacred city of Tibet, an English correspondent gives this interesting description of a visit to the great Buddhist temple, there:

"The Monks have extraordinary deep, devotional voices, reaching deeper tones than any Western bass. The voices of a thousand monks resembled the drone of a subterranean monster, musically plaintive—the voice of the earth god praying for release to the God of the skies.

"In the inner temple are three enormous images of the Buddhist trinity, set with jewels from foot to crown. In the upper story, in a place we called 'hell,' some lamas were worshipping the demon protectress of the Grand Lama. The music here was harsh and barbaric. On pillars, and on the walls were displayed every freak of diabolical invention in the shape of scrolls and devil masks. The object of this worship was huddled in a corner, a dwarf, hideous and malignant enough for such rites.

"All about the lamas' feet ran little white mice, searching for grain, with which they are fed daily. They are scrupulously revered, as in their frail bodies the souls of previous guardians of the shrine are believed to be reincarnated.

"Some of the rites were conducted in absolute silence. As we watched from a latticed window some acolytes looked up, but the monks sat like stone figures, apparently oblivious of our presence. The reek of candles was almost suffocating. 'Thank God I'm not a lama,' said a subaltern at my side, as we clattered out of this unholy atmosphere of dreams."

The British, on Sept. 8, released seventy-six Tibetan prisoners, and presented to each of them five rupees. This caused the Tibetans the utmost gratification, and they indulged in the oddest gesticulations of joy, including the putting out of their tongues. The Tibetans released the political prisoners whom they had thrown into jail for assisting the British on various occasions. Some of these prisoners had been incarcerated since 1883. One aged and tottering man was chained in a dungeon for twenty years. He had gone blind, and refused to believe that he was free. He thought that he had been ordered to undergo torture again.

The British discovered that a secret tribunal, resembling the Spanish Inquisition, exists in Lhasa, and that political offenders are tortured in the same manner as prevailed in mediæval times in Europe.

An African Prince's Mission

"SOMAYON, the African prince," or Rev. Lewis P. Clinton, as he is usually called (a sketch of whose work and his picture appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sometime ago), is still laboring patiently and faithfully to sustain and improve his mission among his own people, the Bassas, at Fortville, Grand Bassa, Liberia, West Africa. About 200 acres were granted to him in Fortville, just within the border of Liberia. The site is on an elevation several thousand feet above sea level, commanding a wide stretch of country. One substantial building has been erected, and six native thatched houses, besides out-buildings. Twenty-nine children, mostly boys, are now in the school. The natives with their children are taught English, and all instruction is given in that language. They learn to speak and to read it quite readily, but find writing a difficult matter. As there are many Americo-Liberians there, part of each religious service is conducted in the Bassa tongue and part in English. Early in the year, Somayon was requested to help the Baptists and Methodist at Hartford and Fortville, in the revival service, during which many Americo-Liberians and natives made profession of faith. Some of the converts have decided to come to the mission to live. As Somayon is pastor, teacher, farmer and carpenter, he leads a very hard-working, self-sacrificing life. Being twenty miles from the coast, he has to take a number of boys and a boat or canoe, to bring up goods from the steamers. During midsummer, when the natives have most leisure, the station is often crowded with Bassas from various parts of the tribe, who come to see the marvel of a man from their own number, who has been so far away and brought back such a wonderful story of Christ, who has died for them.

A PRODIGAL SAVED IN PRISON

"HOW mysterious are God's ways," writes a redeemed drunkard in a letter to the Chaplain of the Tombs. "I never expected my wicked life would land me in prison, but it did. Yet I bless God for it."

These are the words of a man who was lifted from the depths and misery of sin by the grace of God, to live a new life. Fifteen years of incessant debauchery and prodigality made W. W. a veritable hobo, a dread to his family, who feared when they saw him approach the home, and a disgrace to his kind. In one of his letters to the Chaplain he writes, "When I think of the wretched life I have lived these years away from God, the untold sorrows I had brought to my dear wife and family and how I broke my poor old mother's heart, whose prayers I had despised and advice refused; I feel thoroughly ashamed." But well may he say, "I thank God for a praying mother." For after all others had given him up and considered him beyond redemption, she still prayed for his salvation and up to her dying day believed that God would save her boy.

After leaving college, he studied a profession that would have given him a good competence all through life. But the love he had acquired for strong drink in social company blasted his best years. On the threshold of his professional career, he married a beautiful Christian girl, only to fill her life with sorrow and shame. She labored with him late and early; begged him, and pleaded with him as only a woman can, to abandon his dissipated life, but all to no purpose. The drink habit seemed to have fastened itself on him with the grip of an octopus. About two years ago his friends saw that he was in a hopeless condition, and that something must be done at once to save him from physical collapse. He was sent to a sanitarium, where he stayed about six weeks. A few days after he came out of the sanitarium, he had the same appetite for rum that he ever had. A deadly fire was burning within his soul that human remedies could not quench. In this last debauch he called on an old friend whom he had not seen in several years. The gentleman was not at home at the time, so the caller lingered on the premises, not knowing what to do. Finally he fell asleep. How long he remained in this condition he did not know, but when he awoke he found himself under arrest charged with stealing $60 worth of tools. In prison I had an opportunity of speaking to him at close range. After a few days, like the prodigal in the far country, he indeed "came to himself." Under the mighty Spirit of God, he was brought under conviction of sin. He bemoaned his condition and repented in dust and ashes. In a few days he found peace in the Lord Jesus, after which his joy knew no bounds; and he blessed God for the way he had been led, even having to pass through a prison cell before he found the Saviour. During nearly a year's imprisonment amidst the scoffs and sneers of convict companions he remained true to God.

On the day of his discharge, I met him at the prison gate, where I have met hundreds like him. He was optimistic; God was now on his side, and everything would turn out right. His wife could hardly believe the change that had taken place in his life. He is now a saved man, walking in the footsteps of the Master. It is wonderful what the Lord Jesus can do for a poor alcoholic slave, who cried to him as the leper did, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." And he did make him clean, and put a new song in his mouth. JOHN JOSIAH MUNROE.

The Religions of India

INDIA'S oldest religion is the medley of superstitions known as Animism, which conceives of man as beset by shapeless phantasms, mostly impersonal, requiring diligent propitiation by rites and magical ceremonies. Those returned as Animists number 8,580,000, mostly found in Bengal. In the higher forms of Hinduism pantheism is found closely associated with a deeply ingrained belief in transmigration, and a more universal belief in karma. The number of Brahmanic Hindus is 207,050,557, or seven in ten of the population.

Mohammedans number 62,458,077. The actual beliefs and practices of the Mussulmans differ considerably, and the uneducated are deeply infected with Hinduism. Buddhism is professed by 9,476,759 persons. The Burmans, although nominally Buddhists, adhere at least to the ancient Nat, or demon worship, Buddhism being only the superficial polish. The Sikhs, who nearly all live in the Punjab, and the Jains, who live mainly in the Bombay Presidency, both tend to describe themselves as Hindus, so that their respective numbers, 2,195,339 and 1,334,138, are probably understated. The small but influential community of Parsees (94,100) is mainly found in Bombay. Of the 2,923,241 Christians 2,664,313 are natives.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

TRUE picture of every child of God as he is himself, is furnished by the account of the widow who appealed for help to Elisha (II Kings 4: 1-7). What hast thou in the house, brother? When we learn to ourselves truly, we find we are as poor of any resources as was the poor widow. We may have thought we had patience, but it has failed us; we thought we possessed endurance, it has broken down. When we were first saved, we were filled with zeal; we find that just what we want it, it is lacking. We thought, at any rate, we had great love to God, and somehow the very tests through which we have just passed show us that we have nothing that we can call love. Where once it seemed to us our home was well furnished, now it seems like emptiness: only a pot of oil! We are not ourselves but a failure. But another has come, and said to us, "What hast thou in the house?" Tell me, what hast thou in the house? And we bring him the story of our nothingness. Then he tells us what Elisha told the widow: Provide more emptiness still. "Borrow the vessels abroad of all thy neighbors, even empty vessels, borrow not few. And when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the door upon thee and apportion thy sons, and shalt pour out into all the vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full." Here is our lesson: the more emptiness the more fullness there shall be. If we are believers, we are in possession of a source of continual supply. Only a pot of oil, but never failing. The Holy Spirit does not become exhausted as he strengthens us with might in our inner man (Eph. 12: 17), that Christ may dwell in our hearts by faith, and that we may be just what we are so conscious that we are not in ourselves. God permits things to come to a crisis, that we may know the real state of the case, and the much which we mistook for zeal, and love and patience, and endurance, when we were first converted, was more human energy than the real grace of God; it was more of man than of God; it led us to admire us, not Jesus Christ; it led them to come to us, and did not introduce them to him. There had not been in our lives the true consciousness of our nothingness. But when God succeeds in bringing us to bankruptcy in ourselves, then he can take us alone with him when we shut the door, as the widow had to do, and we begin to pour out. To our intense joy we find that the oil, the Holy Spirit, as we pour out, fills vessel after vessel. We have no more patience than before; but when the need comes, Christ dwelling in us makes us patient, and our glad hearts sing him such a song of praise. We are not conscious of our love to him and to our soul; but when he calls us to a test of our love, we find him filling us with it in a way which makes us wonder that he can deal with those so unworthy, such empty vessels! We learn to be so glad of our weakness, and that we have no power to serve him, for the oil fills that vessel also; and we can face a difficult interview or speak a difficult message from him just in the consciousness that he is filling himself responsible, and in the same hour provides what we shall say and speak. It is a life of freedom from self-expectation, a life of liberty. The widow did exactly what she was told. She went from him, and shut the door upon her and upon her sons, who brought the vessels to her; and she poured out. "All it came to pass, when the vessels were full that she said unto her son, 'Bring me yet another vessel.' And he said unto her, 'There is not a vessel more.' And the oil stood." The fullness of the Spirit is commensurate with our emptiness. We can have only so much of the Holy Spirit as of an indwelling Christ as we have room to receive. Now the widow had another errand to the man of God, the name by which Elisha is chiefly designated. And he said, "Go sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest." It is Christ as revealed by the Holy Spirit, who provides for the debt of our sin by his own blood. But he provides himself as our means of living the life of God.

The Greatest of all Catalogues

Too heavy to send by mail, too big to send by express cheaply. Almost twice as large as other catalogues, ten times better. Our new Catalogue No. 73, Edition de Luxe, now being distributed, is the most remarkable catalogue ever published and is being received with enthusiasm by those who have already sent to us for a copy.

The Edition de Luxe is printed on a fine heavy book paper, made especially for this work. Practically everything we have to sell is included in the new catalogue; no sending for special catalogues after you have received the big one. Everything is in the big book, making it the only complete buyers' guide ever published. The Edition de Luxe weighs 6 pounds. When we tell you that other catalogues only weigh three pounds, you will understand what an enormous book our new catalogue is.

Regular Standard Edition

Printed from the same plates that are used for the edition de Luxe, every page exactly the same, but printed on a lighter weight paper in order to make the Catalogue available. The standard edition is the same as we have issued in previous years but of course entirely new for the season of 1904-5.

This valuable Catalogue will be sent to any address upon receipt of 15 cents in stamps or coin as an evidence of good faith. Write your name and address in coupon below and mail at once.

Remember, the contents of the standard edition are the same as in the edition de Luxe.

Don't use a free catalogue just because it's free. Such catalogues are not reliable. Thousands upon thousands are wasted upon children and curious people who never buy a cent's worth of goods; and, to recover the money thrown away in free catalogues, prices are either boosted or inferior goods shipped. Requiring as we do a slight evidence of good faith (15 cents) from each applicant, we always place our catalogues in good hands and very seldom waste one. As every catalogue brings orders we have no losses to make up, and can give our customers the highest grade of merchandise at the lowest prices. Don't waste your time or your money on a free catalogue. Get one that you can depend upon, one that is complete and quotes only goods of honest quality at bottom prices.

If you already have a free catalogue; if you were tempted to send for one just because it was free; we want you to see our big No. 73 Edition de Luxe, published to note the fine paper, the clear illustrations, and the low prices for honest goods. We know you will have no use for your free catalogue after seeing our big catalogue No. 73, and to enable you to secure a copy we invite you to send us an order selected from your free catalogue and we will ship you a better grade of goods and pack with the shipment a copy of our handsome catalogue No. 73, Edition de Luxe, 6 lbs. Handling as we do over 110,000 different articles, we can usually supply goods selected from other catalogues without difficulty and at the same time send a better quality. If you would like a copy of our big 6-lb. catalogue take advantage of this offer at once. On your order say what catalogue you are using and ask us to pack with our compliments one of our latest No. 73 Catalogues (Edition de Luxe).

SHELDON METHOD OF TREATING SPINAL CURVATURE

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of spinal curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the work being effected. Noted physicians in prominent medical institutions, and in private practice are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is strengthened. There is a bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. With the strong testimonials from every State in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is no pain or inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction, or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for our new book giving full information and references.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

J. W. T., Oshkosh, Wis. Is there any wrong in holding concerts, socials and sales in the house of worship, when the proceeds go towards church work? Is it right to do so when some of the church members think it is wrong?

We know there are many who hold what are termed "advanced" and "utilitarian" views concerning God's house, but we confess we cannot share or approve of them. It has always seemed to us to be sadly out of place to turn the Lord's temple into a place of merchandise, or of mere worldly entertainment. The mere fact that the proceeds go toward church work could not in any sense sanctify the thing if it were wrong in itself. While lectures and concerts of the proper kind may not be inappropriate in a church, there is a large class of entertainments at which the line should be rigidly drawn. "There is nothing so degrading to the Church and so destructive to its godliness as to attempt to vie with the world in popular amusements," wrote a well-known preacher. "It is infinitely better to worship in a barn, than in an edifice erected or supported through picnics, fairs, theatrical shows and musical entertainments. Let us have a pure Gospel in a pure church." (See Matt. 21: 12, 13.)

Teacher, Londonderry, N. H. Please tell me where the term "Indian Summer" originated and why?

It was so-called from the custom of the Indians of availing themselves of this delightful time for harvesting their corn. The tradition is that they had a saying: "We have a second summer of nine days just before winter sets in." It usually occurs about the middle of November.

Emily G. L. How do you account for it that Japan, a heathen nation, has made such advancement in everything that is worth having?

Under the enlightened reign of its present ruler, Japan has made rapid progress, because it has not hesitated to supplant many features of the old Oriental civilization by Western ideas. It has sent many of its youth abroad to be educated. It has encouraged foreign trade and commercial intercourse. It has welcomed intercourse with foreigners, and has overruled the opposition of a conservative element among the rich Japanese and the nobility, which vainly tried to hinder the progress of Western ideas. It has been generously tolerant of missionaries, and Christianity has made good headway and has many converts in high places; and as a nation it has kept strict faith, never breaking a treaty, and has endeavored to make justice the highest aim of the nation.

R. E. L., Washington, D. C. Do women vote for Congressmen and Presidential electors in any of our States? I am under the impression they do not vote for national tickets, yet I read articles appearing to say they do vote on national issues.

In Wyoming, Colorado, Utah and Idaho, women possess suffrage upon equal terms with men at all elections.

Subscriber, Hampton, Va. Are Tennyson's Idyls of the King, intended to illustrate the poet's philosophy of life? Are they a gigantic parable? And, if so, what is their teaching in general?

The history of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, is almost entirely legendary, and of remote date, going back to the sixth century. Upon those legends, Tennyson founded his beautiful poems. The Idyls of the King. These stories had some foundation in real characters who lived long ago, and are, therefore, something more than parables. Camelot, where King Arthur held his court, was probably in Wales, where the ruins of the Roman Amphitheatre are still called "Arthur's Round Table." Glastonbury claims to possess the coffin of the king. It is not at all probable that Tennyson intended his poems to be considered as parables, but as melodious and true expressions of the lives and experiences of very human characters; the king, so pure, good and unsuspecting; and of his queen, the beautiful and tempted Genevieve, who fell, because she did not realize the grandeur of her royal husband's character, but who loved him when too late; and of Launcelot, the brave, courtly knight, courageous and true, until he fell under the spell of the queen's beauty.

1. A thorough search of the works of Morris fails to show any poem with title or subject above mentioned. 2. When Dante wrote his Inferno, it was after he had allowed himself a season of straying from the Christian religion, and he designates his life at this period as one of error, and describes this state as one of

R. V. P., Pittsfield, Mass. Is there any way in which children can be taught to readily distinguish poison ivy from the harmless "Virginia creeper," or woodbine? Both grow wild and are very similar in appearance.

Woodbine, or Virginia creeper, and poison ivy can be readily distinguished by children, if they can remember that the non-poisonous plant has five leaves in a cluster, while the other has but three. A good way to impress the difference upon a child's mind is to tell him never to touch an ivy vine that has as many leaves in a cluster, as he has fingers upon his hand. This fixes the difference in the two varieties in the child's mind, so that he is not likely to pick or handle the three-leaved kind.

"OUR CHILDREN'S TEMPLE" AT MONT LAWN, NOW IN PROCESS OF ERECTION

THE Children's Temple is now nearing completion. During the long summer, gangs of workmen have industriously toiled, and the Temple has gradually arisen from its foundation on the green hill, until at present writing it appears as shown in the photograph. When finished, it will be a monument to the glory of Him who loved and blessed little children, and who has so blessed the efforts of those interested in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, and made possible the building of this Temple. There is no feature connected with the Home which has been more popular with its little guests than the religious and musical exercises. The Temple stands upon high ground, where terraces rise from road to door in grassy lines. The building is of brown-stone and granite. Stained glass windows, representing Biblical scenes, will add much to the beauty of the building, but these have not yet been set in place. Much of the interior work of the Temple has yet to be done. Our readers who are interested in the Children's Home and its humanitarian and spiritual mission, will be gratified to note the progress of the Temple building. The illustration, however, gives only a faint idea of the beauty and grace that will characterize the finished structure.

Sutter, to build a saw-mill on the North Fork of the American River, forty miles above Sutter's garrison, at New Helvetia, the present site of Sacramento. On the 24th of January, 1848, Marshall found the historic nugget when he was clearing out the tail-race of the mill. Having boiled the nugget to free it from dirt, he was not quite satisfied that it was gold, so he took it to Sutter's fort, where the news of finding gold was received with incredulity. Sutter and Marshall returned to the mill, the latter becoming delirious with excitement. The fever of excitement spread when the news of the discovery spread. In 1849 77,000 people came to California; 55,000 Americans, the others from all quarters of the globe.

A Rare Opportunity Closing

No intelligent Christian who is watching the events of our times, and desiring to understand the prophecies of the Word of God, on the eventful epoch on which we are now entering, should miss reading the comprehensive and exhaustive volume recently offered in this journal.

The Key to the Figures and Symbols of Prophecy, furnished by Rev. M. Baxter's marvelous THE FORTY FUTURE WONDERS, is invaluable to every student of Scripture. It not only explains the figures and symbols used in the book of Daniel and Revelation, and shows the place in the plan of the ages we have now reached, and where the lines of time converge, but it gives a complete resume of the opinions of the most learned expositors of prophecy in this and former times. It thus forms a complete and up-to-date text-book to the study of prophecy. 532 pages, 50 illustrations. Price 50 cents, including postage.

Founder of the Bread Line

Louis Fleischmann, the Generous Originator of New York's Unique Charity, Dead

NOT by his wealth nor his successful business ventures; not by his noble birth, nor by his bravery as a soldier, who fought his way from the ranks to a commission, will Louis Fleischmann, who died in New York City a few days ago, be most widely and lovingly remembered. His name will be remembered in the coming years as that of the founder of the "Bread Line"—perhaps the most unique, as it certainly was one of the most unostentatious of benevolences. Twenty-five years, he has given food secretly and under cover of darkness nightly, to hundreds of the hungry and unemployed. It is believed that the recipients of his generosity run far up into the hundreds of thousands.

When Lieutenant Fleischmann, an Austrian ex-officer, came to the United States thirty years ago, he decided to follow no other than the fortunes of war. He established a bakery in New York, and later, he added a restaurant, which soon became very successful. A quarter of a century ago, at a time when there was much suffering among the poor and unemployed, Mr. Fleischmann began his singular charity. At a certain hour each night, he gave to the hungry men and women a roll apiece, or a loaf of bread (the applicant happened to be a woman). This strange charity, done in the darkness and without the slightest announcement or flourish of trumpet, was literally an illustration of the old saying of not letting the left hand know what the right hand did. The hunger line grew, and the nightly appeals for bread became more and more numerous; but the kind-hearted baker would not permit even one of the failed applicants to be turned away unsatisfied. The nightly pile of rolls and loaves grew to startling proportions, but he was not dismayed. His day business increased as the night dole grew. The baker was satisfied, and felt that the great charity who provides for all his children, would continue to supply him with the means to keep up this midnight charity, which seemed to be so greatly needed.

In the course of years, the "Bread Line" became known to New Yorkers and to many in other States. Most people marveled at the earnestness of the man, who, all unaided, maintained a charity which to many would have lacked the essential element of showy picturesqueness. But its very unobtrusiveness was a recommendation in its founder's eyes. His heart went out to the "Bread Line" because the poor, shivering creatures who composed it were "too honest to steal, to beg ashamed," and could only summon courage to accept the proffered alms under cover of darkness.

An observant writer gives this description of the "Bread Line":

When all New York, with the exception of the few whose callings kept them up at night, was fast asleep, and when the great avenues of the city were silent and deserted, a pedestrian who might happen to be in the vicinity of Tenth Street at Broadway about midnight would have witnessed a singular sight. Along the sidewalk on the northerly side of Tenth Street, he would have seen a long line of men, and if he had gone sufficiently near, he would have discovered that they were in almost every instance poorly clad, with hungry-looking, eager faces and a general air of hopeless poverty. This line, usually about 300, but sometimes nearly 500 strong, assembled every night at the same hour, and by 12 P.M. was usually complete. Sometimes there were a few destitute-looking women in the line, but the great majority were men. The head of the line was midway between Fourth Avenue and Broadway.

At the stroke of midnight, a door would open, and light would stream out on the dark sidewalk. The crowded line would press up toward the open doorway, where several white-capped and white-aproned men stood beside great piles of loaves of bread. There was a grateful odor of coffee, too, and it was soon apparent that the outside crowd was appreciative of the fact, for they pressed the harder, as one after another at the head of the line received from the white-capped men a loaf and a mug of hot coffee, and then, mumbling thanks, marched off to make room for the next. Some received half a loaf, others a whole one, and if the night were chill and frosty, the coffee was in as much demand as the bread. And so the distribution proceeded, until all were supplied. Some carried their loaves home, to wife or children hungrier, perhaps, than themselves. Others began to eat their portion at once, and gulped down their steaming coffee. In cases of special need, a couple of loaves were given. By one o'clock the line had vanished, the door closed, and Tenth Street resumed its wonted quiet.

This unique scene—the only midnight charity in America—is enacted nightly at the Vienna Bakery, whose Tenth Street side entrance is directly opposite the great business block erected by the late A. T. Stewart. Mr. Fleischmann began to give a few dozen loaves at first, but the demand for the bread grew, and the gift brought blessing, for his business steadily increased also. The midnight distribution was made all the year round, in the hot, sweltering nights of summer and the arctic chill of the winter. Among the beneficiaries were poor, idle workmen, and many homeless tramps, all nationalities being represented. There were never any discords in the quiet line that gathered nightly, and which encircled nearly half the block. A loaf of bread means much to a penniless, homeless man in New York. There are at all seasons many thousands of honest idle men in the city, and to this deserving class and those who may be dependent upon them, the nightly gift of a loaf or two comes like heaven-sent manna. The giver of this singular charity purposely avoided publicity as far as possible; but the grateful prayers of the many thousands who have been helped by the "midnight loaf," during these twenty-five years, doubtless afforded him a deeper and more enduring satisfaction than could be derived from mere worldly approbation of his generosity.

When the death of Mr. Fleischmann became known, there was genuine sorrow all along the "Bread Line." Many of the poor who had benefited by his charity, felt that they had indeed lost a friend. What stories of strange experiences those men could tell—of bleak, cold nights, when they stood in wretched, tattered garments, side by side with other needy ones, waiting for the bread that would appease the gnawings of hunger and give them strength to face the world anew. Some could have told how they had been saved from suicide by his generosity; others could have related how they, with their families, had for weeks been kept from starvation and fed until work was secured.

Many a factory hand and many a rough laborer could have told such a tale of Louis Fleischmann's generosity as would have stirred all hearts in admiration for the man who, like Ben Adhem, desired only to be known as "one who loved his fellow-men."

Who shall say that the tribute of the "Bread Line" to its founder, even though unspoken, is not a sweeter and more gracious offering than the world's praise, or the conventional respect with which society surrounds its departed members. The "Bread Line" will go on, but the memory of Louis Fleischmann's kindness will long be kept green in the hearts of the poor of New York.

THE "BREAD LINE" AND ITS FOUNDER, MR. LOUIS FLEISCHMANN

THE SOLITARY CONFLICT

A Sermon by Rev. E. Ryerson Young, B.A.*

HERE is no reason why a young man should be accused of "building castles in the air," or "day-dreaming," if he sits down, as he should, and carefully considers what is before him. By some great power he has been placed in this world, and has been endowed with certain faculties, emotions, and sensibilities. He is surrounded by splendid opportunities and seductive temptations.

What has beset his fathers will be his portion. Their pathway has been marked by successes and failures, health and sickness, joy and sorrow, blessing and cursing. The scenes and costumes may change, but the plots of life are invariably the same. As these were lived by the fathers, they will also be experienced by the children. For twenty, thirty, forty or fifty years, the contest of life will have to be fought. There is no shirking of it. We fight to win or lose.

I was much impressed by a statement made by an umpire in the description I once heard of a wayside wrestling match. It seems that during the contest, someone wished to render assistance to one of the combatants.

"Stand back," thundered the umpire, "he's got to fight it out alone!"

Intrinsic Energy

How this statement rings in our ears, "He's got to fight it out alone!" And how true it is. It is true of everything in life. When, as ignorant children we were sent to school, the best of teachers, with the best of text-books in their hands, stood helpless in the art of instruction until we began ourselves to combat with ignorance. Then they were only kind advisers and clever demonstrators. We had to fight it out alone. Every advancement we made, every rule we acquired, every problem that we solved, we wrought out alone. The education that has been of service to us has been wrought by our own efforts into the woof and fibre of our own natures. That which was pasted on and shone perhaps through a gala day, was soon washed off in the bitter struggle with the elements of actual life, and the resultant knowledge that came to our rescue was that which we had wrought out by the labor of our own minds.

When fell disease struck us, and we were laid upon a bed of suffering and pain, wise physicians were brought in, operations were performed, medicines were given, and healing balms supplied; but the physicians said, unmistakably: "Hush, give him a chance; he must fight it out alone!"

No doctor ever healed a patient, nor drug, nor surgeon's knife. The knife may have cut away a deformity, or a foreign growth; the drugs may have helped to rectify a chemical action in nature's fluid, and the physicians may have brought the wisest advice; but at best they were only kind assistants. They might strip him for the fray, soothe him, guard him, and give him as fair a chance as possible; but the real fight back to health has to be fought out by the nature that is within him.

Sir John Marshall, F.R.S., in opening the session of the London Universal Medical School some years ago, said: "The healing force of nature is the agent to employ in the healing of an ulcer, or the union of a broken bone, and it is equally true that the physician or surgeon never cured a disease; he only assists the natural process of cure performed by the intrinsic conservative energy of the frame, and this is but the extension of the force imparted at the origination of the individual being."

In Business

The same thing is true in the business world. In spite of all the talk of the influence of money, political pulls, and such things, the ultimate battle is fought out alone. Rather than help, money and the influence of friends have often proved prejudicial; and the real man has only come out of the contest triumphantly when he has been stripped of all these. Sailing under other's colors, especially of men of place and power, too much has been expected of us, and failing here has meant our utter effacement; whereas, if we had won our way to recognition by our own effort, our success would have been permanent.

A graduate of a school of practical science asked an influential friend to introduce him to a great mining magnate, and help him to get a good situation. "I'll do it with pleasure," said his friend, "but it will be the worst thing I can do for you." "How's that?" asked the young man. "Because, if you get the situation you want, the stigma will ever follow you that you got it, not by your own merits, but through me." "What do you advise, then?" "Put on a pair of blue drills and go to work; if there is anything in you, and, I believe there is, it will soon come to the notice of the proper man."

The young man heeded the words of wisdom. He put on his blue drills, and, with his tin dinner-pail, set out to fight his battle alone. His efficient work, ability and tact, above all his management of men, was soon talked of, and when a peculiar situation opened, he was recommended to this very magnate as the man he wanted. To-day that young man is at the head of one of the greatest mining companies in Canada, and was so appointed when only twenty-nine years of age. This may be a case of extraordinary success and extraordinary promotion, but the moral is the same for all: Extraneous influence, instead of helping often prejudices; the only road to success, is to strip and fight it out alone.

Heroism in a Lumber Camp

Another case of youthful success comes to us from the lumber business. A young man, handsome in appearance, social in his tastes, and fond of outdoor sports, paid little heed to business or any other serious thing. His father was one of the wealthiest lumbermen and he had almost unlimited spending money. But one summer there came a sudden change. His father's huge mills and lumber piles were swept out of existence by fire. Immense booms of his logs were scattered to the winds by the storms as they were crossing the Georgian Bay. Other logs were "hung up" on river banks because of the want of water to "drive" them down to the Bay. The father's riches were swept away in one short summer. But there was mettle in this young man. He left his sporting friends before they could leave him. He sold his race horses and other sporting outfits; put on a suit of coarse, stout mackinaw, and went into the lumber woods. That fall and winter he mastered the art of lumbering, re-organized his father's business the following year and then met his father's creditors. To-day it looks as though the young man were going to recover all that his father had lost, and place the business on a firmer basis than it had ever been before.

That young man is only a sample of many to whom rich and indulgent parents, money and position, are inimical to their best interests. Noble manhood and success are theirs only, when they have been stripped and had to fight the battle out alone.

The Spiritual Conflict

And as true as this is in the intellectual, physiological and business world, it is true in the spiritual world. The best of fathers and mothers cannot have faith for their sons, the most godly of teachers cannot lead another soul to God. He will have to open his own heart; he will have to fight his own battles with self, and yield to God of his own free will. The parents may place a godly example before him; the teacher may awaken conscience, and bring the truth to bear upon his mind, but they are only spectators and monitors, the battle is fought in a field that is far beyond their reach. It is fought in the innermost recesses of his heart; and from the days of the first spiritual conflict, until the time when he is called to account before the Throne of Judgment, and, even then, he will have to stand alone.

This being true, it is no wonder Paul said to Timothy, and, through him, to all young men: "Take heed to thyself!"

"Personality," says Dr. Van Dyke, in his masterly work, The Gospel for an Age of Doubt, "is the intimate reality." Not what a man has, not what position he holds, but what he is in himself—his personality is what counts. Personality is the principal thing. It is power of service, his utility in the world, depends on his personality. His receptivity of the lessons of life and of the grace of God, depends upon his personality. It is the kernel of all things to him. Hence, it is important that a young man should look well to his ways, his thoughts, his whole being—for the sum total make up the core and equipment of his personality.

We hear a great deal said to-day about having a strong body. It is certainly one of the primary requisites for a young man to possess. In his contests in life's arena, in his service to his fellows and to the cause of his God, a young man needs a well-developed, to him, well-trained body. There is a moral influence in muscle which no right-minded person will deny.

Athletic Evangelists

Two young evangelists were going through the country. It was their desire to sow the good seed broadcast through the land. One day, they met a man in a field, and spoke to him about his soul's salvation. The old man shrugged his big, heavy shoulders, and said something about religion being only for women, weaklings, and those ready to die. After a vain effort to impress the man, the young men went on. They were college athletes, and took a wide ditch at a jump. The old man saw this, and shouted: "Well done!" The young men jumped back as easily. "Where'd you learn to jump that way?" asked the old man with interest. The young men told of their college training in the gymnasium, of their studies, and their spiritual life, and of their desire to spend their holidays in winning souls for Christ. The old man was deeply impressed. He asked the young men to his home, to pray with him and his wife. Before those young men left, they had every reason to believe that that old man and his wife had given their hearts to God. The man had become interested in their ability to jump a wide ditch, and the young men were wise to use the lever that God had placed in their hands, to pry open the door of the man's heart for God. Many of our young missionaries to miners, lumbermen and cowboys, have succeeded by making their athletic ability tell upon those active, bit-of-door men; and many a preacher and Gospel teacher has failed, because he lacked both athletic power and sympathy with muscle.

But it is possible to make so much of muscle that the body usurps more than its right. It is only a third, and perhaps the meanest third, of our personality. There are also the mind and soul to be considered. Of the body is the outward manifestation. Yes, its price is even humbler still. The body is but the instrument of the mind and soul. Still it is very closely linked to them. Its health often affects our hopefulness in the affairs of life, our faith in God and our love for our fellows. When the body is ailing, then we find love, love and faith painful efforts; and both mind and soul the prey of many temptations, which, in time of health, have no influence whatsoever. Then let us give the body its due, take care of its health, cultivate its muscles and nerves and make it as efficient an instrument as possible.

Neglected Opportunities

In the training of the mind the first requisite is knowledge. Knowledge is power. And all other things being equal, the man of knowledge wins. There is no limit placed on any man's power to acquire knowledge. Some men have been born in the gutter, as it were, who have from that most inimical environment forced their way to seats of learning by their industrious pursuit of knowledge. On the other hand, many men have failed to make full proof of themselves and have had to see others enter upon positions that opened to them, but which they could not take because they were not prepared. In their early days they despised their opportunities to acquire knowledge, neglected their books, fooled away their time at school, and disregarded the instruction of their teachers and admonitions of their parents. Now their lives are marred because of their ignorance.

A case of this kind came under my own notice. It was of a man in whose home I had been welcomed. He had a charming wife and some lovely children. He was an official member of his church, and most highly respected by all who knew him. Because of his exceptional fidelity and great mechanical skill, his employers offered him the highest position in their gift. The man felt that he was not able for it. The new position demanded some office work, drawing out plans and other theoretical work. He had been a light-headed boy and had never set himself seriously to any task until his conversion. Then it was too late, for his school opportunities had passed. So now when his opportunity came—for which position he was abundantly fitted by general executive ability—he failed, because he had not a good technical education.

The Eruption of Mount Vesuvius

MOUNT VESUVIUS has lately shown signs of volcanic activity, and as a gentle hint of what may be expected to follow, has belched forth, and spilled over the sides of the crater, lava scot and in such quantities as to melt the steel rails of the railroad (built in 1880), which carries visitors up to within 150 yards of the mouth of the crater.

Some idea of the heat of this boiling mass, which is pouring down the volcano's sides, may be gathered from the fact that on one occasion the lava stream felt silver, the melting point of which is 1,870 deg.; at another time copper was melted, and this would require 2,4 deg.

Half a million of people dwell in Naples, which is within eight miles of Vesuvius. While the inhabitants of the city are awestruck at the wonderful scene of the volcano in action, they are not frightened or panic-stricken, because they believe they are safe from serious trouble. As the great molten streams flow down the mountain side, they take a short cut to the sea, leaving Naples to one side. The volcano has been in bad temper for some time, and in one of its recent outbursts, spit forth a rock weighing two tons—a play-fountain of what it might do, for during previous eruptions great blocks of stone, weighing between thirty and forty tons, have been thrown high above the crater.

In spite of warnings, and knowledge of impending peril, the director of the Vesuvius Observatory remains bravely at his post, with his instruments, recording the violent ebullitions. The men who stay in the neighborhood, and in such a frightful temperature, are in great danger for at any moment these superheated masses of molten rock are liable to explode, overwhelming and destroying everything in the vicinity.

Professor Matteucci, a distinguished Italian geologist, in the University of Naples, is at his post within the danger belt, studying the phenomena with great interest. During a previous season of volcanic activity, the professor spent days upon the mountain slopes, and risked a fearful death upon the very edge of the crater. This was in 1892, when the lake of boiling lava rose to within 200 feet of the rim of the crater.

The last great eruption of Vesuvius occurred in 1897, and at that time several new craters were formed. The villages and vineyards were destroyed, but the peasants had warning, and all escaped. At last accounts the present eruption was increasing in violence; red-hot stones were being hurled to a tremendous height, and were falling down the mountain side with a deafening sound. The upper station of the Funicular

Railway has been destroyed, and all the wooden huts in which the guides lived have been obliterated. All vegetation within a mile of the crater has disappeared, while earthquake shocks add to the danger of the situation. Many villagers have left their homes, and are camping in the open air. Thousands of spectators are viewing the wonderful spectacle, and so great is the curiosity of many tourists—leading them to approach within dangerous proximity to the volcano—that a large number of Carbineer Guards have been stationed to prevent crossing the prescribed limits.

There is no historical record of the first colossal eruption of Vesuvius, but at that time the mountain was probably twice its present height. The upper half of the cone was blown away, and it was around this truncated cone that the early Greek settlers founded their little colonies. No eruption having taken place for teen centuries. Its crater walls, five miles in circumference, were hung with trees and brush, and at the base cattle grazed on a wide, grassy plain. In 1631, after a series of earthquakes, the volcano again burst into activity. Dust and stones were blown for hundreds of miles, fine particles falling in the Adriatic and at Constantinople. Great streams of lava came down the mountain sides, and so swiftly did destruction come upon them, that 18,000 people perished. Since this great clearing out of the crater, which practically emptied it, Vesuvius has never been completely quiescent, and at intervals it has again broken out.

In the presence of such evidences of nature's forces, as are indicated in a volcano's rage, and ruin wrought by it, one is impressed with the insignificance of man, and the cities he builds. A traveler, speaking of the buried city of St. Pierre, says that it is already assuming the appearance of a vast gray granite rock. Only a short time ago this gay city, called the "Paris of the Antilles," was in full tide of human life and activity, with its white roofs, its towers and cupolas gleaming between the fronded crests and lithe gray trunks of the royal palms. The crash of bands was heard in the squares, and the tinkling of mandolins from the ships lying in the roadsteads. Now, a scarred mass of lava completely covers the city, with all its former life, color and music, as though a huge mausoleum of granite had been reared above it. There are no ruins—and nothing to indicate that 25,000 people lie buried there. Gaunt and colossal rises Mont Pelee, its terrible head dimly seen through poisonous vapors, its slopes scarred and lava-streaked, and rent with gigantic fissures and wild gorges, while at its base are piled up masses of blown-out crest. Where the suburbs of the city once stretched over a level plain, the earth, which has washed down the mountain sides by the rains, has formed a soil where grass and trees are beginning to grow. In a few years this tomb of a city will be alive with the vegetation of the tropics, and the now scarred sides of Pelee be covered with forests of green. All the rest of the island excepting the city, has emerged from its pall of ashes, in new beauty and greater luxuriance.

Thus does nature, in kindlier mood, seek to hide the ravages and scars made by the raging and unconquered elements, such as submerged the ancient cities, and which now threaten the region of turbulent Vesuvius, whose shakings, rumblings and explosions make it appear as if the whole mountain would be rent from top to bottom. When the volcano is again quiet we are likely to hear something interesting from Prof. Matteucci.

centuries, the volcanic nature of the locality was probably unknown to the people who planted their vineyards along its fertile slopes, and built their villages at the mountain's base. Early in the Christian era there were a succession of earthquakes, doing much damage to the towns. This was preliminary to one of the most awful catastrophes in the record of human history. Three towns were destroyed, Herculaneum, Pompeii, and Stabiae. After this catastrophe the volcano remained in a condition of feeble activity for nearly fif-

Another qualification of mind greatly needed is courage. Many young men are overthrown by conceit—stainless, overweening pride—that demands acknowledgment of men for virtues they think they possess. Conceit and pride are not courage; nor is "cheek," which is often an accompaniment of pride. Courage is a more modest virtue. It accompanies knowledge and is attendant, its knight, to make sure what knowledge has pointed out is properly his own. Many a good man has been browbeaten and trodden upon because he had not sufficient courage to claim that which was his due.

Another virtue so requisite to truest manliness is temperance or self-control. It were better to lose an arm or limb than to allow any passion, desire or inclination of the body or mind to overstep the bounds of moderation. The pathway of life is strewn with the results of gluttony and drunkenness, jealousy and anger. He who is to be the true gentleman must early learn the virtues of masterful self-control. He, and he alone, will enjoy the blessings of peace, health and good citizenship.

But no young man will do his duty or occupy a place in the world worth having without industry. It were trite to urge upon this virtue. The leaders of men are the world's burden-bearers. Genius is only another name for capacity for concentrated work. The young man who has had implanted early the love and capacity for hard work, is on the road to successful achievement in whatever line of life he enters.

Knowledge, courage, self-control and industry have been called pagan virtues. It does not hurt them to be called such, if Socrates and Solon, Cincinnatus and Marcus Aurelius are samples of the kind of men they develop. They are fundamental virtues of truest manhood. To them we should add brotherly kindness, that great virtue of love, that grips our fellows to our hearts with silken cords as strong as steel, and causes our love to go out to them, so that we shall treat them as we would have them treat us, until we love them as we love ourselves.

But there is even a higher manhood than this. A young man may be full-blooded and look out upon the world with a clear eye; he may have his ear and soul cultured to appreciate the melodies of life; his mind may be trained, full of courage and the model of industry and temperance, yet he may miss half the blessings that God has for him.

The windows of his soul are to be opened that the light of heaven, the example of Christ, the inspiration of eternity may dispel all miasmas of earth, its doubts, its fears, its darkness. God wishes to give wings to the young man's hope. He wishes to strengthen him with faith in the inner man, and above all, He wishes the young man to let Him implant His Spirit in his heart as his guide, instructor, inspirer in all things, the Witness to seal the young man as His son and joint-heir with Jesus Christ to the inheritance of saints here as well as to that which is beyond.

Thus within the possibilities of a young man we see the cultivation of his body, making his cheeks glow with health, his eye true, and his muscles the instruments of efficiency; the development of his mind by knowledge; the acquisition of the graces of courage, temperance, industry and brotherly love. We see his soul full of faith and hope, reverence and divine love, whereby, through the mystery of Jesus Christ, he is made partaker with the saints of the blessings of salvation from sin here, and an assurance of eternal bliss hereafter.

On the other hand, we also see within the possibilities of a young man—his natural abilities wasted through carelessness, his body the prey of disease, passions and lusts rampant; his mind filled with folly, cramped by ignorance, subject to remorse and fears, and his soul steeped in sin, defeated through his own folly in this world and treading the precipice of the future with no hope in the next.

It is no wonder that Paul, who saw all these possibilities as clearly as we do, and all other lovers of their fellows, say to every young man, "Take heed to thyself!"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in the month of August, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reconnoitred by Jacobin soldiers, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness. By a clever ruse, Macartney compels Garron to let him take the marquis and Louise with him, in one of the ship's boats, while Garron is a prisoner in his cabin, disarmed and guarded by Brébœuf, who has now returned to de Vaudémont's service. Macartney lands his party at Alexandria, and the marquis meets Bonaparte, while the Irish captain sails off to seek Nelson and the British fleet.

AS ONE GENTLEMAN TO ANOTHER

"WHY did you not appeal to me?" asked Bonaparte.

"We were not permitted. There were—papers—in my baggage. They would—have—incriminated—"

"I see," said Bonaparte frowning. "And with these papers in his possession, Garron thought to force your consent! The scoundrel! How did you get here?"

"There was an English prisoner on the ship. You recall the frigate captured just after you left Malta?" Bonaparte nodded.

"Her captain was wounded and brought aboard Le Tonnant. Do you remember, monsieur, that night in Toulon there was a young officer with us?"

"Yes."

"That was he. He loves my granddaughter, and I have at last consented to his suit."

"He is a fortunate man, mademoiselle," said Bonaparte, smiling kindly at Louise, who found herself blushing deeply under the ardent gaze of the young Frenchmen crowding around them.

"My servant betrayed me—as I supposed—and wormed himself into the confidence of Garron. We were in the cabin together to-night, a few hours ago. Brébœuf—"

"Who is he?"

"The servant I speak of, monsieur. He seized Garron, forced him to place a boat which he had left alongside, at our disposal, and we came here."

"The English captain?"

"Came as far as the wharf."

"And then?"

"As he was armed, he forced us to leave the boat and went away in her himself."

"Where?"

"To seek Admiral Nelson and the English."

"Ha!" said Bonaparte sharply.

"Pardon, sir," interrupted another officer.

"What is it, Beauharnais?" asked Bonaparte impatiently.

"Some papers came from Captain Garron this afternoon, addressed to you, and marked urgent."

"Where are they?"

"I laid them on your desk, general. Here they are, sir," said the young man, after rummaging a moment among the papers on the desk.

The vice-admiral started as he recognized the packet. He thought swiftly a moment. Should he endeavor to prevent the general from reading the papers? Bonaparte gave him no time to act. He broke the seal, tore off the wrapper hastily, and examined the documents enclosed. He read with incredible swiftness, and soon mastered the contents of the papers. When he had finished, he looked keenly at the marquis.

"A conspirator, a royalist, a rebel, La Vendée!" he muttered, frowning. "Is this true, monsieur?"

"Sir, I believe it to be so."

"And you come here, here in my presence, sir," said Bonaparte harshly, striking the table furiously as he spoke, "and admit it! 'Tis past belief!"

"Monsieur," said the marquis, "that I have put my head in the lion's mouth I am fully aware. You can do no less than decree my death. I am ready. I have, however, information of such grave importance to communicate to you concerning Garron, that I venture to hope you will neglect the gentleman in behalf of his granddaughter, and perhaps for his grandson as well."

CHAPTER XXVI

CAPTAIN HONORÉ'S CONFESSION

AT this moment, Captain Marmont stepped forward from the door, which he had been guarding.

"General," he said, saluting, "there is a young officer of your guard outside, who desires to see you upon urgent business."

"Who is it?"

"Captain Honoré, sir."

"Ah!" said the general. "Bid him wait outside a moment, monsieur. If I read these papers aright, sir," continued Bonaparte, turning to the marquis, "this will be your grandson, who was mentioned by you just now as engaged in a conspiracy to abduct me."

"I fear so," answered the marquis, while the officers of the staff started in surprise.

"We shall have a family reunion, monsieur. He comes just in time. Was this a prearranged—"

"Sir!" interrupted the marquis hastily. "He does not know that we are within three hundred miles of him. 'Tis fate, sir."

"Happy or otherwise," said Bonaparte, "we shall see. Meanwhile, your paper."

"Someone else," returned the marquis slowly, "might exact a promise." He looked keenly at the general. "I shall not do so, sir. I appeal to your honor, as a soldier and a gentleman."

He handed the paper which Macartney had signed to the little officer.

"A traitor!" exclaimed Bonaparte, rising, and crushing the paper in his hand. "I shall deal with him. Monsieur, you have appealed to me in behalf of this lady, and have trusted me with the determination of her future. I pledge you the honor of a Frenchman, and of a soldier, that her protection will be my pleasure; she shall be as sacred as my sister."

"And my grandson, monsieur?"

"As to that, wait! Will you withdraw with your granddaughter into the anteroom, and remember that whatever happens you will make no sign, that you will not come out, under pain of my displeasure."

"Sir," said the marquis, "deal gently with the lad."

"You condemn his course?" asked Bonaparte.

The old man was honest; he could plead for his grandson, he could not betray his cause.

"Would that I could say so, monsieur," he answered bravely, "but in the service of the king—"

"Enough! You will retire there. Marmont, admit Captain Honoré."

A young man, clad in the gorgeous uniform of the guard, stepped through the open door, walked rapidly up the room, clicked his heels together before his general, and saluted. His resemblance to his sister was so marked, that everybody in the room started in surprise.

"You wish to see me, Captain Honoré?"

"Yes, general. But—" He looked about him. "Alone."

"Gentlemen," said Bonaparte, "you will withdraw to the other end of the room."

"But, general, is it safe?" said Kleber, while Eugene de Beauharnais, a stepson of Bonaparte, presuming on his relationship, bent lower and whispered, "You know, sir, what has just been disclosed. Would it not be best at least for me—"

"All of you go!" said Bonaparte imperiously. "I trust myself entirely to brave young Captain Honoré."

"And you may well do so, sir," said Honoré eagerly. "Why should I not trust you?" asked Bonaparte looking intently at the young man.

"At the storming of Alexandria you were at my side; I have not forgotten that soldier who lunged at me just before you cut him down. It was you, was it not, who threw yourself in front of me when the wavering square almost broke before the charge of the Mamelukes at the battle of the Pyramids? I owe you much, sir, he added.

"You have paid me in full, sir," cried the young officer, "my commission as captain—"

"You will go higher, Captain Honoré, I predict. 'No, general.'"

"Why not?"

"Because I am come to—"

"To what? Out with it!"

"To resign my commission, and surrender myself into your hands."

"Ha!" said Bonaparte. "And why?"

"Sir, I am the Comte Honoré de Vaudémont. My father was killed in the Terror—"

"I had no hand in that."

"No. My grandfather is, or was, rather, a vice-admiral in the ancient royal navy of France. At present he is engaged in fomenting rebellion against the Republic in La Vendée."

"Is this true?"

"On my honor, sir."

"Proceed."

"I was an officer in the Austrian army. Boy I was, sir, I fought against you at Arcola, at Castiglione, at Rivoli, at—in short, wherever I could."

"You know how I can fight then?"

"I do, general."

"Go on."

"Having resigned my commission after the fall of Campo Formio, I found myself without employment."

"What did you then?"

"When I heard rumors of this expedition I sought a commission in your army, sir."

"Had you tired of fighting against me—or the Republic, that is."

"Not at that time, sir."

"Why did you enter our service then?"

"To—to—kidnap you, general. You were the only obstacle between the king and France. I would do his Majesty and France as well a service by removing you."

"Well?"

"That is all, sir."

"And have you abandoned that design?"

"I have."

"Why?"

"General—I did not love you—before."

"And now?"

"I come to confess, to place myself in your hands. I could not accept your promotion, or remain longer in your army, without telling you."

"Why, again?"

The general's eye searched the young man as he would wrest from his officer the most secret thought of his heart even.

"I do not know," answered Captain Honoré, sustaining the intent and penetrating scrutiny of his captain with as much firmness as he could muster. "I cannot help it. I believe that the greatness of France lies with you. Her destiny is in your hands. At Toulon, on the ship, here in Egypt, I have watched you. You, of the old nobility, have thought of you almost as a Christ. We were wrong. The past is gone, sir. You are of the future. As between the king—may God forgive me!—and yourself, I have chosen—"

The young man who had spoken with all the ardor and enthusiasm of his day and nation, hesitated, reluctant and yet insistent to say the final word.

"Which?" asked his general, imperiously.

"You! If after what I have told you, if you think me worthy of any trust or confidence, if I may still serve in your army—as a volunteer, monsieur—in any capacity—I beg you to command me."

"Who were your confederates in the plot?"

"That, sir, I implore you not to ask! I cannot tell. For myself, I have abandoned it. And my withdrawal renders the whole attempt null and void. You will hear no more of it. I have placed myself unreservedly at your disposal."

"Why do you this?"

"I said I do not know, I cannot help it. I love you," said the romantic boy—he was scarcely twenty—"that's all."

Your associates," said Bonaparte, reading from the paper, "were Barbaloux, de Charretein, d'Esterrette and that Italian Salvatore."

"Mon Dieu! General, how do you know these names?" exclaimed Captain Honoré, profoundly surprised, and terrified as well.

"I know everything, my young friend."

"Are you a god then?"

"Tis very simple. Your grandfather told me."

"My grandfather! Impossible, sir! He is in La Vendée!"

"Not so."

"Where is he then?"

Bonaparte stepped to the side of the room, seized the heavy curtain depending before the door, and threw it quickly back.

"There!" he cried, pointing to the recess.

CHAPTER XXVII

THE COMTE CHANGES HIS ALLEGIANCE

CAPTAIN HONORÉ stood as if rooted to the ground.

"Monsieur!" he said, "what has happened?"

"I thought you were safe in La Vendée!"

"And would God I had been there,"

he answered the marquis coldly, stepping forth as he spoke, "ere I heard one bring my name declare himself a traitor to his king."

For a moment, Captain Honoré hung his head before the fiery words of his grandfather. Then he faced the old man.

"He, too, was a de Vaudémont."

"Sir," he said, "believe me—"

"Not another word!" said his grandfather. "Not in three hundred years have the de Vaudémonts failed in devotion to the throne."

With respect to your age, sir, and ties of blood and affection by which I am bound to you, I will be heard!"

Give the lad a chance, monsieur," said Bonaparte, coolly helping himself to a pinch of snuff.

Not from any motives of self-interest continued the young comte "nor from any other reason but because I love my country, sir, have, I attached myself to the fortunes of General Bonaparte. Sir, had you seen him as I have seen him; had you known him as a son and as friend, you would realize that he is the future of France. As such, sir, I salute him. It is he who has saved our distracted country. He will make it in the future, as it has been in the past; great among the nations of the world. And as a king, I offer him my sword, my heart. All that I have is his. He is the king!"

Bonaparte flushed, and swept a glance around the room.

Dumas leaned against the door, with a smile upon his face, half-humorous, half pitying; the giant Kleber stood with hands clasped behind him, his head bent forward, frowning. The others, younger men, were watching the dialogue between the marquis and the comte with the greatest attention.

"The king of France! Nay, that were too narrow a confine to limit the little shadow, even then, loomed large upon the horizon of civilization. The king! Bonaparte smiled. The time was not yet. He was not to be swept from the clear purposes of his vision by the enthusiasm of a romantic boy."

"Vive la République!" he said, throwing back his head, "I am the servant, not the master of France, citizens and friends!"

And there was no one to tell them that the servant was above his master. Instantly the room rang with cries. Like Cæsar on the Lupercal, their hero had refused a crown!

"Monsieur," said the marquis, turning to Bonaparte, "what is this Republic to which you have engaged yourself? To which this foolish boy has given his allegiance? I am an old man, I have lived long and seen much. I have done some service to the state. My words are not without weight in the councils of the king. Give over this mad, this impossible scheme! Restore the ancient monarchy. You have the power. In addition to the consciousness of having done right, I have re-established your rightful king upon his throne, you can name any reward. You and all of you! I promise it on the faith of a gentleman. You shall be a constable of France, the king will ennoble you—what you will."

"Sir," said Bonaparte, smiling, "my patent of nobility dates from the battle of Montenotte. What! Shall I undo the terrible work of the past five years to bring back a king of shreds and patches? Bah! If he wants a kingdom, let him take one. We recognize no rights but the will of the people, and the right of the sword!"

Again the room rang with cheers. When the tumult had subsided the marquis began again.

"I made you an offer, sir, as one gentleman to another. You please me," he continued, "I owe you much. When the day comes, call upon me. I shall not be ungrateful."

"Um!" said Bonaparte. "We have not settled that other matter yet."

"True," said the vice-admiral. "I had forgotten that. May I ask what you propose to do with my—that young man yonder?"

"Your grandson?"

"Grandson no longer."

"But my brother still!" cried Louise, gliding past him, and taking Honoré's hand in her own.

"Bien, mademoiselle!" said Bonaparte, looking approvingly, yet keenly, from the marquis to the comtesse, as a sudden suspicion lodged in his mind. "Here is no collusion?" he asked.

"Monsieur," said the old man, "you have just cause to doubt the fidelity of those who bear the name of de Vaudémont. I pardon your insinuation. I assure you on my honor, that no inkling of my purpose, or of the

"I had no hand in that," answered Bonaparte. "I was but a boy in the Terror. When I was able to do it I stopped it. There shall be no more of it in France."

"Sir, I am an old man, as I have told you, and as you observe. What you do with me, matters little. May I take it, that you will protect my granddaughter, this young lady?"

"I will look after her," said Honoré quickly.

"Not with my consent, sir," said the vice-admiral coldly. "We have no relationship with such as you. There may be excuse for General Bonaparte and these others—there is none for a de Vaudémont. I have eaten the king's bread, I am the king's man."

"But I have not, and I am not!"

"Be it so. You have voluntarily cut yourself off from me and mine. I wish to hear nothing from you."

"Give him time," said the general to the distracted young officer. "Monsieur, as I said before, I pledge you my honor for the safety of your granddaughter. Mademoiselle, you may trust me."

"I do, sir," answered Louise, giving him her hand, "as unreservedly as my brother loves you."

Bonaparte took her hand, and bending low over it, kissed it.

"You are my witness, gentlemen," he cried, turning to the group at the end of the room, "this lady is as my own sister."

"And as to myself, general," said the marquis indifferently, "I would know your pleasure."

"Sir," said Bonaparte, "I have sworn fealty and devotion to your granddaughter; from this hour your grandson is one of my most trusted officers; think you, I could be rigorous toward yourself under such circumstances? Go! You are free!"

"Sir," said the marquis, "I warn you that the first use I shall make of my freedom will be to offer my poor services to my king."

"Be it so. Next to a staunch friend I love a determined enemy. It would have been a pleasure to have seen your flag flying over the fleets of France. We lack a sea officer. There was de Suffren; there was that mad Scotchman, Paul Jones; here are you."

The marquis shook his head.

"Oh, I did not mean to bribe you! I was only thinking. You are free to go where you will, to abide here, to return to the fleet, to go back to Europe at the first convenient opportunity. You may take a message from me to the man you call your regent, if you will."

"And that is?"

"Tell him that France awaits his coming. He may take it, if he can, sword in hand."

"General," said the giant Kleber, impulsively running up to the little man and taking him by the shoulders, "let me embrace you! You are as great as the universe!"

"Thank you, my good Kleber," said the general, patting him on the shoulder as a child might caress a huge dog. "But we have more to do, gentlemen. That traitor Garçon—"

He read aloud to them all the damning agreement that Macartney had signed for him.

"What did you say was the state of affairs on Le Tonnant, monsieur?" asked Bonaparte, as the execrations with which those present received the news permitted him to be heard.

"He is guarded in his own cabin by my man Brébœuf. He will be safe until morning."

"A rare man, this Brébœuf."

"Rare indeed, monsieur."

"Too good to lose," said Bonaparte, who pulled out his watch and looked at it. "It is past two in the morning. It is an eighteen or twenty mile ride to Aboukir. Call it two hours. We can scarcely start before half after—half an hour to get a boat, that will be five, half an hour to reach the flagship; half hour more for details and to allow for mistakes. Say six o'clock! That will do. Gentlemen, I ride to Aboukir to-night! Captain Junot must have a troop of light horse brought up. Which of you will ride with me? I go to punish a traitor, to save the life of a brave man."

The officers crowded around, protesting and acclaiming their willingness, nay their anxiety.

"Kleber, you and Dumas remain here in charge. The rest to your horses. We'll start from the palace gates. You, monsieur?"

"I am an old man, general, but to save my ancient servant's life I would ride with you if I died at the end of the journey."

"Good!" said Bonaparte. "And you, mademoiselle?"

"I go with my grandfather."

"All of you go!"

Said Bonaparte, imperiously discovery of the plot to abduct you, could possibly have been communicated by me to this unhappy young man."

"And you, sir?"

"Twas my conscience, general, brought me here. I knew not that the Marquis de Vaudémont was nearer than La Vendée."

"I believe you, Major de Vaudémont."

"Major, sir!"

"Must I repeat myself, Major de Vaudémont?"

"Not that name, general, if it please you," interrupted the marquis.

"Very well. He has already won honor as Captain Honoré. He shall make that name as great as your own. La Salle, will you make out a commission for Captain Honoré, as major, and an order detaching him from my guard, and placing him on my personal staff? I trust him, you see, monsieur. A man may change his allegiance."

"Not such a man as I, sir," said the old man.

"Perhaps even you. It is my hope, sir, to bring back to France, some day, those nobles and gentlemen who survived the Terror."

"Your Republic killed my son," said the marquis gloomily.

A New Hague Conference

DEEPLY gratifying to the whole nation must be the tribute paid to our Government by the members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, who recently had an interview with the President. They are earnestly desirous that a conference of the representatives of the nations should assemble to take up the questions left unfinished by the Hague Peace Conference, and carry them forward to a practical issue. Looking for the head of some nation, vested with the right to call such a Conference, they chose the President of the United States as the most fitting for the duty. The application shows how high this country stands in the esteem of the world, and how clearly its attitude toward the supreme object of securing peace is recognized.

They must have been pleased with the courteous hearing that the President gave to their suggestion, and with his ready compliance. He gave them a definite promise to call the Conference, and expressed the earnest hope that the invitation would be accepted by the other governments which participated in the former Hague Conference, and that the Conference itself would tend to the objects desired.

The project is one which Christians throughout the world will hail with hearty approval. It aims to promote the negotiation of arbitration treaties between the various nations, and to organize a Congress to assemble periodically for the discussion of international questions. With these definite objects fixed, it ought to have a practical result. Every nation, at least in theory, has a horror of war, and, though there is reason to doubt whether it is always sincere, it will be a distinct step in advance to have the governments put on record and to provide them with the means of proving their sincerity. So much, at least, the Conference may do. The followers of the Prince of Peace throughout the world will give it their hearty sympathy, and we trust they will pray that the promise the President has given may lead to such an issue that men will learn war no more and permanent peace among the nations may be secured. No glory could come to any nation greater than that of initiating a movement that by a single step resulted in insuring the peace of the world.

"He that Giveth to the Poor"

THERE died in New York, two weeks ago, a man who, in the course of a long and successful business career, gave to the world a noble example of compassion for human suffering. Louis Fleischmann did what thousands of other good-hearted men and women have done at times, in feeding the hungry: but with him it was not an intermittent impulse. From that first midnight, long ago, when he fed a few hungry and homeless wanderers of the street, until the day of his death, he kept up the work unceasingly, night after night, through twenty-five years. His little group of beneficiaries quickly grew to be a regiment; but the bread was always doled out with the same liberal hand, and no one was ever turned away.

Of the multitudes he kept from starvation and of the thousands of humble homes from which his gifts alone held back the wolf of famine, it is probable that Louis Fleischmann knew little. Hunger was, to him, a sufficient certificate of genuineness, and he asked nothing more. If a man or woman, for the sake of a loaf, was willing to stand for hours in the cold and the darkness, in touch with their famishing comrades of the "Bread Line," that alone was enough to convince him that their hunger was a very real thing. It took money to keep this strange charity going, but its originator realized how true it is that "he that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord," and that such an investment bears good interest. He prospered in business, and the seed sown in darkness was multiplied many fold in the daylight. Among his intimates, he was known as a prosperous man, and a supporter of many good works. For years his midnight alms to the "Bread Line" were known only by a few. Some may have smiled at it and called it weakness; others may thoughtlessly have regarded it as an encouragement to idleness. Little did they know that that midnight mission of bread was the brightest spot in the man's life. Done in darkness and in secret, this silent, unassuming charity now surrounds his memory like a halo.

Many readers of this journal have, in past years, had a "Bread Line" of their own. It has extended across seas and continents, and has fed the hungry at the remotest ends of the earth. And never yet have their secret benevolences failed to return to them in blessing.

Providence

"NO," says the sceptic, "I don't believe in Providence. Nothing can convince me that there is any truth in the foolish superstition of an overruling influence which cares for what we poor mortals do. Everything in nature is against it."

Have you observed that wise little insect, the ant? Its vision is extremely limited; indeed, naturalists tell us some of the species cannot see the length of a man's hand. The Jain of India, whose creed teaches him to respect the life of every animate thing on earth, will step aside to avoid treading upon an ant. You can arrest its progress by pushing an obstacle in its way with your finger and it will never know the unseen power that placed it there; you can overshadow it with your hand, and though it misses the light, it cannot see the substance that hides it. You can clear its path of some rough barrier or remove some danger which in another moment it must have encountered. Yet in all this, it neither sees nor knows you, and it is powerless to anticipate your purpose, or to escape your influence. You have played Providence to the ant.

So, throughout the material world, from the lowest orders even to the highest, the sources of many things are hidden. The sceptic who appeals to nature to support his unbelief, finds nature itself refuting him. As in the natural world, so it is in the spiritual. Surrounded by human limitations, we cannot penetrate the veil that now obscures our vision; but we can feel the influence of that overshadowing Presence that is everywhere guiding and protecting us—the presence of the Supreme Being who created and who upholds and governs all things, upon whom even the least of His creatures is dependent for the supply of all their needs, and whose ear is ever open to the appeal of those who place their trust in Him.

A Dangerous Experiment

VERY good motives and a sincere desire for the welfare of young people, are evident in the recent sermon of a pastor in Jersey City, N. J., on the subject of dancing. His past record and the earnestness of his present efforts to do good in the community, are sufficient evidence of the purity of his purpose. It is the wisdom and prudence of his attitude that must be considered.

In his church, many methods have been adopted to interest young people, to keep them out of temptation, and to provide educational facilities and amusements which will brighten their lives. It is now proposed to organize a class there for the teaching of dancing. We can easily understand that young people who want to learn to dance, might acquire the art in a church with less danger than they would in a dancing academy, and so far the motive is good. But is it wise for the Church in any way to endorse the amusement or provide the means for its indulgence?

It is a well known fact, proved by testimony only too conclusive, that the first steps to a moral downfall are frequently taken in the dance. The confessions of women whom our social reformers are trying to reclaim, in the large majority of cases attribute the beginning of the course which has had so deplorable an end, to the sensations and associations of the dance. It is irrelevant to speak, as our friend does, of the dancing of Bible times as an approval of the modern dance. The circumstances were different and the conditions of society have changed. Even in that connection, deterioration had gone far when Herod and his guests witnessed the dancing of Salome, which led to the murder of John the Baptist. The king was not him after the spectacle, and the girl herself must have been very low before she could ask for so ghastly a reward. The dance does deteriorate the modesty of the woman and excite feelings in men which ought to be kept in subjection. No one can look on at a dance, as is practised in these days, without seeing in the attitude and in the expression of the faces of many of the dancers, signs of serious moral danger.

In view of these facts, can a Church consistently teach the art of dancing? Granted, that there is strictest supervision, that every tendency to evil is eliminated, and that the incongruity of dancing in a building consecrated to God, is ignored, what security is there that the young people who acquire the art there, will not afterwards practice it in evil places, under degrading conditions? A girl who has become proficient in the art, is not likely to refuse an invitation to a dance which is given under different circumstances. The Church is organized for higher purposes. Its aim is to lead people to find their pleasure in different ways than in dancing, and it ought to limit its methods to that aim. Least of all, should it initiate any course which has been proved to be a source of moral danger. We should be glad to hear that our friend, the Jersey City pastor, has reconsidered his project and abandoned it.

India Fears Famine

WE learn with sad concern from letters just received from missionaries in India, that fears are entertained of a famine, owing to a failure of the rains. The hope that they may yet fall has not been finally abandoned, but the prospect is critical. We are glad to see by the public prints that the government, having learned by sad experience how terrible is the mortality which occurs at the visitations, if arrangements are not made early to afford relief, has already taken measures to alleviate the calamity should it unhappily occur.

Rev. Frederick Wood, Secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Committee, writes: "The rains of a failure this year in the Bombay Presidency. For about five hundred miles to the North and South of Bombay there were but a few small showers at the beginning of last month and since then there has been practically no rain and crops have withered in consequence. The prospects are very gloomy indeed for the coming year and famine is staring us in the face."

Mr. M. B. Fuller writes: "The crops in many places past all hope. Slight showers have kept them growing, now they are drying up. The newspapers speak of the conditions as serious, but not yet desperate, for about the rains now would relieve the situation very much. We are praying earnestly that they may speedily come."

The Hon. Sir James Monteath, addressing the Legislative Council at Poona, said: "Unless rain comes soon the situation will be very serious. There are signs of rain, and I hope they will be realized, but if famine does come, the government is prepared to meet it. Tools are ready for use and the work will be resumed where it was left off, but I really hope it will be averted."

Among the Workers

—A VERY ACTIVE Anti-Profanity campaign is in progress at Aurora, Dearborn Co., Ind. Rev. S. E. Davies, Rev. Eirich, Rev. A. R. Beach, and other pastors are giving work every encouragement.

—AS A RESULT of the revival services conducted by Dr. Smiley at Las Animas, Colo., every gambling saloon in the city has been effectually closed. Dr. Smiley is now at Grandison, Colo.; from there he goes to Nevada, Ia.

—THROUGH THE EFFORTS of the Committee on European Work of the General Assembly, the American colony at Frankfort-on-Main has been enjoying regular preaching services each Sabbath during the summer, at Hotel Imper. The following pastors have conducted the services: Rev. Joseph W. Cochrane, D.D., Philadelphia; Rev. William C. Carter, Kansas City, Mo.; Rev. James I. Good, D.D., Reading, Pa.; Rev. C. T. Back from the Antarctic

AFTER three years spent in the unexplored regions of the far South, the British ship Discovery has returned home. She has won for her country the credit of having penetrated nearer the South Pole than has ever been done before, and on her return she received a royal welcome. The crews of the vessels in the harbor manned the yards, and ringing cheers and salutes were given by all hands. The King ordered a Polar medal to be designed and stuck for presentation to the officers and crew.

The crew of the Discovery tell thrilling stories of their adventures. One of the most characteristic is that of a sleighing party to Cape Crozier, where it was intended to build a cairn in which to deposit dispatches in the event of a ship arriving to relieve the party. Cape Crozier was about forty-five miles from the point where the ship was frozen in, but the journey seemed much longer on account of the soft snow. The dogs finally became so exhausted, that they could pull no longer. They were therefore let loose and the sledges abandoned for the time. The men set out to walk to the ship. They had to cross a range of hills a thousand feet high. The temperature was thirty-six degrees below zero. As they reached the summit of the hills, a strong wind struck them, almost paralyzing them with cold. The descent was dangerous. The side of the hill was like the smoothest glass. Once the whole party went slipping with fearful velocity down the hill. They saw a huge crevasse before them, at the foot of which, two hundred feet below, there were sharp, jagged rocks. Happily their downward course was arrested on the verge of the crevasse by a ridge of soft snow. A lie farther on they were shocked by fatal proof of another chasm. The man who was ahead, suddenly threw up his hands and with a loud cry shot forward at frightful speed. He disappeared instantly, and when the party crawled warily to the place where he was last seen, they were on the edge of a sheer precipice the bottom of which could not be seen. A search was made for his remains afterwards, but no trace of them could be found.

Another adventure, happily less tragic, was that of one of the crew named Hare, who was lost on one of the expeditions. He says:

"I can remember wandering about for a long time trying to get on the right track for home, but I could not make out where I was, and in the howling storm I became thoroughly exhausted. I must have fallen down out of sheer weariness and gone straight off to sleep in the snow. I heard afterwards that on two succeeding nights they sent out search parties after me, but could not find me, and it is not to be wondered at, for I was lying asleep under the snow all the time. After the second attempt they gave me up for lost, thinking I must have succumbed to exhaustion. Somehow or other I remained alive. On the second day I woke up in the morning. The warmth of the sun soon revived me. I looked around me and soon discovered the vessel. When I arrived all on board had a great surprise."

It is astonishing that in the pursuit of scientific knowledge men could be willing to encounter hardships so severe and run such risks of death. Their devotion to the cause is beyond praise. We can but wish that there was similar earnestness in the search after heavenly truth, for God is all knowledge and all wisdom.

"He looketh unto the ends of the earth and steth under the whole heaven" (Job 28:24).

Bridegroom Bound

A wedding took place at Pittsburgh, Pa., a few days ago that was attended by peculiar circumstances. The wedding guests had assembled at the house of the bride and were awaiting the arrival of the officiating clergyman. It was remarked that the bridegroom was not present, and many reasons were suggested for his absence. The bride, however, seemed to be under no anxiety. She said he would be on hand when everything was ready for the ceremony. A guest who was in her confidence ascertained the reason for her equanimity. He accompanied her to a room in the rear of the house, when the clergyman arrived, and there, to his amazement, was the bridegroom securely tied, hand and foot to a chair, by a stout clothes-line. The bride explained the reason for his being so secured. She had given him, two days before, thirty dollars with which to purchase refreshments for the wedding supper. He went out, and instead of making the purchases, spent the money in liquor and a game at cards. He came back in a drunken condition and reported the loss of the money. He was in a stupid, maudlin state, and his bride concluded that such a man was likely to absent himself when his presence was required. She had therefore taken the precaution when he fell asleep in his chair, to tie him up so that there might be no trickery at the wedding. The man was released and conducted to the presence of the clergyman and the wedding ceremony was duly performed. The bride is only too likely to find that a husband whose presence at his wedding could be secured only by his being bound with a rope, is not worth having. He is probably already bound to the sins that will affect her life, by bonds that no power but that of Christ can break.

"Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin. If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed" (John 8:34, 36).

The Oldest Living Thing

The question of what is the oldest living thing on earth was thought to have been settled when a yew tree was found at Hedsor, in Bucias, the circumference of which is eighty-three feet. It is well known that the yew adds one ring to its growth every year, and as these rings are about one-tenth of an inch apart it was easy to calculate that the tree was thirty-two centuries old. Now, however, comes a new claim. There is in the gardens of Chapultepec, Mexico, a huge cypress with a trunk one hundred and twenty feet in circumference. If the same rule applies to the cypress as to the yew, which is said to be the fact, this tree must be over sixty centuries old. As the arboriculturists point out, trees do not die of old age. Floods or winds may sweep it away, insects may destroy it, younger trees planted near it may rob it of its nutriment, but under favorable circumstances the tree does not yield to the lapse of time, but continues to grow and thrive. How small does the life of man on earth appear in comparison with such periods. But even these sink into insignificance when we think of the duration of the life which is the inheritance of all who partake of the nature of Christ.

"I am the living bread which came down from heaven: if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever" (John 6:51).

A Convict's Inheritance

The Supreme Court of New York has just rendered a decision in accord with the report of a referee, which settles two disputed estates. One of them was a contested will, involving a property valued at fifty thousand dollars. It had been held by the widow of the testator, who claimed the right to dispose of it at her death, but which, it was contended, must pass to his son. The other was that of a man who had died without making a will and for that there were several claimants. It is worth seventy thousand dollars. In both cases the decision of the referee, endorsed by the Supreme Court, gives the money to a man who is now in Sing Sing prison serving a life sentence for murder. He has already been in prison thirteen years, and as there are no extenuating circumstances in connection with his crime, there is no reason for executive clemency. He is comparatively a young man and is keenly alive to the value of money, so that his position, with the knowledge that two fortunes belong to him, is peculiarly distressing. How grieved he must be, as he thinks that by that one crime, he has shut himself off from the enjoyment of so large a fortune! The time will come when a far greater loss will be experienced by all who, dying in impenitence, realize what their sins have deprived them of.

"There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when ye shall see Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, and all the prophets, in the kingdom of God, and you yourselves thrust out" (Luke 13:28).

A Plea for a Cell

A Police Sergeant in New York tells a remarkable story of an application for arrest. A haggard, distressed man walked up to his desk one evening, and asked to be confined in the prison. "What for?" asked the sergeant. "What have you been doing? Want to make a confession?" The man replied that he had done nothing wrong, but wanted to be restrained. He said that he was a confirmed gambler, and when he had money in his pocket, he could not resist the temptation of roulette. He had a considerable sum upon him at the time, some of which belonged to a relative. As he was walking home, the craving for the table came on him with mighty force. He quickened his pace homeward, but the struggle increased in intensity. He knew he ought not to risk the money, but his resolution was failing him. In a few minutes he would give way. The sight of the green light of the Police Station suggested the idea of restraint, for he believed that by morning the impulse would depart. The sergeant told him that he could not lock him up without a charge. So determined, however, was the man to be incarcerated, that he went outside, and with his cane smashed a street lamp in order to qualify himself for admission as a prisoner. It is a pity that a man so anxious to avoid evil and yet so conscious of his weakness, did not try the remedy of the apostle, who owned that before he tried it, he too did the things that he would not.

IN THE SHADE OF THE VINE

BY MARGARET E SANGSTER

Happy Days

NOW where are the happiest days, dear?
Are they days when life is young,
When the feet go flying swiftly,
And childhood's songs are sung?
Are they days of the spring-time gladness
When the blossoms wreath the bough,
When the ripples dance and the sunbeams glance,
And the sower follows the plough?

Now when are the happiest days, dear?
Are they days when life can hold
The gain that has followed labor,
When the trees are red and gold?
Are they days of the splendid autumn,
When the tides of joy are at flood,
And the garnered wealth of harvest
Proclaims that God is good?

All days are happy days, dear,
That are spent in the light of heaven,
That are free from greed and malice,
Nor touched by an evil leaven.
Or young, or old, we find them
Happy and full of love,
If our faith is strong, and our work a song,
And our eyes, we lift above.

Women's Manners

TIME was when we boasted proudly that the manners of American men, as observed in public places toward women, were perfect. A woman could go from coast to coast in this land, traveling in all sorts of conveyances, secure from insult or misunderstanding, and everywhere meeting with brotherly kindness and courtesy from strangers on the road. Lately, as the country has vastly increased in population, and foreigners both high and low have modified what might be called Americanism, we have heard complaints that a change has come. In cities especially, where everything is in a rush, and crowds elbow each other, in frantic haste to keep engagements, men are no longer distinguished for gallantry. Yet the fault is not wholly theirs. A good deal of blame lies at the door of women themselves. The manners of women in public places, it must be admitted with regret, are open to a good deal of criticism.

Choose for investigation any local train plying between a large city and its several outlying suburbs, and making stops at intervals of a few minutes or a half hour. The hour may be late afternoon, when women are returning from shopping excursions in town, or from a matinee or reception. Behold my lady as she enters a car and selects a comfortable seat near the centre. She establishes herself comfortably in the end, beside the window, rather near the middle. The left over space, intended for another passenger, she quietly fills with whatever little parcels or wraps she may have in hand. Presently the car fills with other people as tired and as encumbered with bags and parcels as my lady herself, and these walk down the aisle with the air of interrogation and anxiety conspicuous in the outs when they are wistfully regarding the ins. Possession being nine points of the law, my lady surrounds herself with a penumbria of polite aloofness, is deaf and blind to their presence and utterly indifferent to their need of seats. There is one beside her which she could easily surrender to another passenger, and to which she has not the shadow of a claim. Her ticket pays for a single seat; but she looks as if she is expecting a friend or a husband for whom she is reserving a place, and the casual passer-by accepts this as a conclusion and asks no question. Along comes Mr. Insistent or Mrs. Fairplay, a person of experience and determination, who has encountered my lady before. A gentle inquiry is made, "Is this seat taken?" Whereupon, with a haughty glance, a manner most ungracious, and an evident hostility, madame removes her bundles and reluctantly makes room for the newcomer.

The little scene is familiar. None the less it illustrates the selfishness and lack of good manners which are peculiar to a large class of well-dressed, well educated and prosperous American women. One would expect them to know and to do better. Take another example. A woman boards a street car which is nearly full, seeing a place where she may crowd in, she plumps herself calmly down on the chignons of her next neighbor without so much as the slightest apology. "Will you not move a little, you are sitting on my gown," one day entreated the gentlest of women of such a heedless dame, large of bulk and heavy of avoirdupois. No reply. The request was modestly repeated, still no reply. A stony stare into space was the only rejoinder. Even a worm will turn, and the most timid of women becomes brave when it is a question of saving her best gown from destruction. "Conductor," said the one aggrieved, "will you please ask this lady to release my dress?" If there is one thing more than another that a conductor, in common with other men very much dislikes to do, it is to interfere in a matter of privilege between women.

The conductor blushed and looked deprecatingly at everyone already installed, and I have heard her imperiously order people to move up when there was not an inch in which they could move. Women constantly accept seats proffered them by the courtesy of men, without so much as a brief nod of acknowledgment or a single word of thanks. They do this when they are aware that they will reach their destination in a few minutes, while the man who rises to let them sit may be many miles from home. Arrived at their corner, they do not take the trouble, as they might, to resign his seat to their benefactor, but slip out without a thought of him, while somebody else pounces upon the place. This is one reason among others why men have learned to screen themselves with a newspaper when women stand. If it is becoming a rule, that nobody except elderly gentlemen of the old school and very young men rise to give women seats in cars, the bad manners of women themselves probably account for it.

Another thoughtless act, amounting to an excessive discourtesy, is frequently due to the fact that a woman forgets how long it takes to make change. It is to get on a train or boat, and to lose it means for the passenger a hurry a tedious delay. He may have to wait an hour for another train, but my lady who blocks the narrow thoroughfare as she stops to buy a ticket, extracts a five-dollar bill from her pocket-book, and carefully counts her change while a long line of impatient men and women fume at her back, has not the faintest conception of the annoyance and anxiety she is causing. Not a soul on the planet, except a civilized woman, does so shockingly rude a thing; but women do it every day of every week in the year.

Were a censorship in manners instituted, the good women who have a way of talking about their private affairs, the peddlers of their husbands and the foibles of their friends, in public places, freely mentioning names, would certainly come in for their merits. So, too, would women who have the want of taste to wear long trained gowns a crowd, feeling cross and showing it when people inadvertently step on and tear them. What could be expected? If one liberally allows the rich stuff a gown meant for indoor or marriage wear, to trail on the street where people are hurriedly walking, she has no cause for complaint, if someone tread on it and ruins her finery. All that is left to her is to be gracious and accepting an apology.

The woman whose murder is that pins threaten the eyes of her neighbors, and whose suitcase, set down in the aisle, comes near breaking the legs of the unwary, must also be convicted in any court of inquiry, for a regrettable lack of good breeding.

Be it noted that the essence of good breeding on which all conventionalities rest, is love for one's neighbor; kindness is the cornerstone of courtesy. The truly polite person is a person easy to live with, in public as at home, and never forgetting the obligations of consideration which are obligatory on the road.

Our best society ought to exemplify our best manners, and women trained in its usages should not hesitate to stare superciliously at others, and times to show a singular disregard for the feelings of those they meet. At a great Exposition, several years ago, on the day devoted to a certain great State, the women most conspicuous for their loudness, their contempt for the comfort of their neighbors, and their ingratitude for civilities tendered, were women from the most exclusive set of the most cosmopolitan city of this continent. Obviously, the manners of some American women need to be mended.

Her face in turn crimsoned with anger, and jumping up she shouted, "Stop the car!" out of which she flounced, an image of outraged propriety. The fact is, that people who are habitually rude and habitually self-centered always feel that they are in the right and others in the wrong, no matter how boorish their actions may be. The Battle of the Scottish Churches

A STRANGE AND UNEXPECTED DECISION BY THE HOUSE OF LORDS WHICH MAY YET RESULT IN A GREAT SPIRITUAL REVOLUTION

FROM A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

CHURCH-GOING and Bible-loving Scotland is agitated as it has rarely been agitated during the past thirty years. The judgment given by the House of Lords on August 1st, has brought this about. That judgment affects the right to church property valued at $35,000,000. It also deals with questions which the Scottish people have closely studied and have very deeply at heart.

In this remarkable conflict of Presbyterianism in Scotland—the Free Church vs. the United Free Church there is at present a truce. No further decisive movement in the great battle between these two Presbyterian churches can take place until some time in October. The decision of the House of Lords giving the victory to the Free Church, after the long drawn-out legal struggle with the United Free Church, is said by some to be final and permanent. By others, it is believed that an appeal can be made and the judgment reversed. In order to report both sides of the controversy impartially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to make a question clear to its readers, I visited Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Perth, Inverness and certain small places (like Dunfermline and Dumfries), and there obtained from the leaders on both sides the facts set forth below.

August 1st, the House of Lords as the Court of Appeal, decided by five to two, in favor of the appeal of the Free Church of Scotland. The Lord Chancellor, Lord Davey, Lord Robertson, Lord James and Lord Alverstone were the majority; Lord Macnaghten and Lord Lindley were the minority. This momentous decision affects practically every town and village in Scotland. It hands over to twenty-four ministers, funds and property valued at over seven millions sterling virtually the judgment decides that a body of twenty-four ministers and five thousand communicants—about three per cent. of the Free Church of Scotland—constitutes the true Church, and it vests in this small minority the control and rights of property in one thousand one hundred churches, innumerable mission stations throughout the world, colleges and great halls in the cities, and over a million sterling of money.

Briefly, the status of the case is as follows: Some time ago, by a majority of six hundred and forty-three against twenty-seven, the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland agreed that the United Presbyterian Church should be taken into the Union. The latter Church unanimously approved of this. Of the ministers who then were invited to come under the banner of this "United Free Church," twenty-four, chiefly pastors of small churches in the Highlands refused to cast in their lot, declaring that they were the true Free Church, and as such entitled to control

James (of Hereford), Robertson and Alverstone supported their contention, whilst Lords Macnaghten and Lindley were against them. However, the majority was sufficient and the appellants won.

To enter into the details of the judgments would be tedious. It is sufficient to say that twenty-four ministers have, by the judgment of the highest court in the land, the control of the enormous properties and funds in dispute, valued at $35,000,000 and one thousand one hundred ministers are practically made homeless and churchless. And that judgment causes the United Free Church of Scotland to lose the assets of the predominant partner—the Free Church. The judgment has created amazement in the Established or State Church, for the decision denies the right of the Churches to legislate for themselves.

The judgment does not become operative until the Court of Session meets. A great religious upheaval is probable. Religious work will be seriously hindered. Home Rule in the churches may be demanded and establishment will undoubtedly be hastened.

It is anticipated that if both sides stand steadfast, almost endless litigation will result, and that, instead of being a final settlement, the judgment of the House of Lords will be but a beginning.

In Scotland the decision of the House of Lords has had the effect of a bombshell, and surprise has almost stifled criticism. It was quite expected that the appeal would be sustained, but none of the United Free Church officials and leaders dreamed for a moment that the minority of the Free Church would have vested in them the control of the church buildings and funds.

In 1900, the remnant members of the Free Church were prevented by policemen from gaining access to the Free Church offices in Edinburgh, and they will now have the power of invoking the aid of the police to enforce their rights. Advices have been sent from the offices of both the Churches in Edinburgh to the respective congregations, counseling a policy of calm, and admonishing that all things should be done decently and in order. A leader of the United Free Church characterized the House of Lords' judgment as "a monstrous injustice," while an equally representative supporter of the remnant Church declared that it was "the working of Divine providence." At Crieff, a placard was placed on the United Free Church notice board, stating that "by order of the House of Lords, the church was for sale."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

WE can imagine the captive maid addressing Naaman's wife in some such words as these: "My dear mistress, I beg of you not to weep, as though there was no hope for your noble husband. Next to the king he is honored above all men as the commander of the host of Syria. I am quite sure he can be cured. I know there is no one in Syria who can do it, but I remember the prophet Elisha, in my own land of Palestine, where I lived before I was brought as a captive to Syria. In the name of our God, he did many wonderful works, even raising the dead to life. Oh, that my master would go to him. I believe he could recover him of his leprosy."

Naaman's wife raises her head, dries her tears, and, with a new look of hope in her face, sends for her husband, and conveys to him the message of the little maid. He consents to go, hoping in spite of doubts, that it may be as the maid has said. He prepares to travel in state, as his position demands, riding in his chariot accompanied by servants, with yet other chariots filled with rich garments and gold, to be given to the prophet in event of his healing. He carries a letter from his King Benhadad, to the King of Israel, telling him what Naaman's errand is, and requesting co-operative interest.

Naaman reaches Palestine and presents the letter to King Jehoram. The king is made angry by it, thinking it only a plot to engage him in war. He tears his clothes in fear and distress. Elisha hears about it, and sends a message to King Jehoram, to let Naaman come to him. Naaman and his cortege, after having traveled more than 150 miles, stand at the door of Elisha's house in Samaria. The Syrian general is too proud to alight, but remains in his chariot, thinking the prophet will come out to him. But Elisha sends his servant out with the message: "Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean." General Naaman's pride is hurt. He breaks forth in angry words, and disdains the muddy Jordan, compared with the clear, emerald, and sapphire rivers of his own land. "Wash in Jordan," not he. One of his servants tries to smother his ruffled feelings, and at last persuades him to do as the prophet has said, because it is a little thing, and will be on his way home. One, two, three, four, five, six, seven times he dips himself in the Jordan. His leprosy is gone; his flesh is indeed as the flesh of a child, rosy, soft, pure.

He returns to the house of Elisha, that he may inform him of the cure, and give him the present he has brought. This time he does not sit in his chariot, but gets down and stands in Elisha's house. His leprosy is cured, but better than that, his idol worshiping is cured, too. He declares to Elisha that the God of Israel is above all gods, and that he shall be worshiped by him, and he begs that he may be allowed to take as much earth from the sacred soil of Palestine, as two mules can carry, that he may build a fitting altar on which to offer sacrifice to the true God. He expresses the hope that he will not be misunderstood, when he must of necessity accompany his master, the king, into the idol temple of Rimmon.

He urges upon Elisha the acceptance of the gift he has brought, amounting perhaps to about seventy-seven thousand dollars. But Elisha refused it, giving him to understand that the gift of God can not be purchased with money. But the covetous servant of Elisha, Gehazi, followed hard after Naaman when he is returning. And when he has overtaken him, he makes it appear that Elisha has changed his mind, and now asks money and clothing for two students, sons of the prophets. Naaman willingly gives twice as much as was asked, even two talents of silver, equal to three thousand, eight hundred and eighty dollars, and besides two changes of raiment. And he even had his servants carry them back to the tower where Gehazi wishes to secrete them. But Gehazi's perfidy has been made known to Elisha, and when he had reproved him, he caused the leprosy with which Naaman had been afflicted, to come upon Gehazi, as a picture of his loathsome love of money. And Gehazi goes out from the presence of Elisha, a leper, white as snow.

Illustration and Application

The healing of Syria's great general was initiated by the magnanimous suggestion of one of his maid servants, and the failure of his quest for health was prevented later by the wise suggestion of one of his men servants, both illustrating servants' opportunities seized and used aright, while Gehazi illustrates a servant's dishonest use of an opportunity, to his own undoing. Nearly all of us are servants of somebody, if not in the household, in the shop or field, and so a lesson on servants' opportunities will have something in it for us all.

1. The Little Captive Maid's Opportunity. Let us recall the fact that her master had stolen her from her country and her home, in Israel, on which he had swept down with his soldiers, cutting down the father, perhaps, and taking the little maid to be a slave for his wife. Under these circumstances, one would expect that when the sign of leprosy developed in her master, she would exult in it as his deserved punishment from God. But in her Old Testament lessons at home, she had been taught more than once to forgive her enemies, and she considered that it was because her master had been taught to worship gods of war and cruelty, and knew no right but might, that he had done these wrongs. In advance, she had learned the prayer of Jesus for his enemies,

"WOULD GOD, MY LORD WERE WITH THE PROPHET"

"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." What God says of our sins we should try to say in our minds to those that have sinned against us: "Thy sins and iniquities will I remember no more." A good old deacon often used to pray, "Lord, help us to remember what we ought not to forget, and to forget what we ought not to remember." Helps to memory are common, and much needed to-day; but helps to forgetting are of equal importance. And the things we most need to forget are our grudges, that crowd out God.

The little maid did a great thing in forgetting her wrongs,

THE RIVER PHARPAR, NEAR DAMASCUS

and another great thing in using the opportunities that her very misfortunes had brought her. In childhood, she had, perhaps, dreamed of serving God and her country, as Miriam and Deborah had done, and it had, perhaps, seemed as if all her chances to be useful had been cut off when she became a slave. Perhaps she had said then, "There is no good, there is no God, and faith is a heartless cheat." But as in Joseph's case, it was her very slavery that brought her greatest opportunity to do good. By becoming a slave, she became also a successful foreign missionary, the means of converting the greatest man in Syria, except the king. Just such a case occurred in ancient Europe. The warlike Goths at one time overran Asia Minor, and carried away a Cappadocian whom they called Wulfila, or Little Wolf, because he was a favorite, which was due to his good behavior. It was a saying, "Little Wolf can do no harm." When he grew old, having learned the Bible in childhood, he translated it into the language of the Goths, having invented an alphabet of written characters, and thus they became a Christian people. A modern little home missionary in England, who was not a servant, was passing on her way to church a miserable hovel, of which the children spoke in whispers of terror, for it was the home of Jim Morris, a poacher, a moonshiner, a quarrelsome drunkard, whose wife was even worse than himself. She heard that Sabbath morning sounds of drunken revelry in this hovel, but with a silent prayer she entered the gate and the half open door, and faced the group of three rough men behind whom was a rougher woman. What a contrast was the beautiful child, daintily dressed, Bible in hand, her sweet face bearing a pained and grieved expression. She said: "Hear church bell calling you to worship God in his house of prayer." The rough woman turned fiercely, and with an ordered the child to leave. But her husband, Jim Morris, said, in an unusually pleasant tone for him: "Hold your tongue, wife; the young lady is right. Come lads, I'm to church—who'll go with me?" And so the poacher followed the child up the church aisle that day, and listened tentatively through the service. For forty years he was a faithful Christian. His wife, too, after a while, became a Christian woman, and that hovel was transformed into a Christian home. No wonder the little girl, now known as Maria Louisa Charlesworth, wrote a book on Ministering Children.

2. The Servant's Wise, Brave Suggestion. When Naaman, angry that the prophet did not humor his pride by coming out to him, but sent instead, the order, "Wash in Jordan seven times, and thou shalt be clean," about to go back home unhealed, one of his lowly attendants, wiser than his great master, was brave enough to say quickly, before it was too late, "If the prophet had let thee do some great thing, would you not have done it? How much rather should you do this little thing, to wash and be clean!" Humility is ever wiser than pride. Many a man would become a Christian if he could do it in so big, proud way. The very first thing such a man needs to learn, is, that he must give up his own way, and accept God's way. But the special point to note to-day, is, the swift, brave way in which that servant seized the opportunity to save his master. A few moments' hesitation, fear that any seeming rebuke, however gently spoken, would intensify the wrath of his angry master, and perhaps turn it upon himself, would have been fatal. But for the swift, brave word, his master would have rejected the cure and gone back to die of his leprosy.

A Russian came to this country last spring with his oldest daughter, leaving his wife and four smaller children to follow by a later steamer. Symptoms of trachoma were developed in the daughter's eyes, and she and her father were detained on Ellis Island. They escaped from the detention prison, however, and the rest of the family arrived while they were still at large. The authorities decided that the mother and her children should be sent back to Russia. Their case was appealed, but while the appeal was pending, President Roosevelt paid a visit to Ellis Island. He passed through the detention prison, and was almost out of reach when the mother learned who he was, and rushed after him, crying out in Russian, "Oh, please let me out to look for my husband! Don't send me away from him forever! I will find him if you'll only let me out! Oh, please, please let me go!" The President's attention was attracted by her cries, and an immediate investigation revealed circumstances on which he ordered the entire family released. The mother had grasped the opportunity for deliverance when it came nigh unto her.

There is no sin in which Christians fall so often as the sin of losing opportunities. While we parley with excuses, the opportunity sweeps by and is gone forever. A woman with a camera started out on a long drive through the beautiful foothills of southern California. She meant to bring back a number of pictures as souvenirs of the day's trip, yet she was anxious to secure only the best view. A picturesque adobe house, half buried by climbing vines, claimed her attention early in the day, but after a moment she relinquished her intention of photographing it. "I'm sure to find others just as pretty, and perhaps a great deal prettier," she said to herself. Through the day she passed by the scenes near at hand, in the hope that the next mile or two would bring "something a little better." The picturesque and the beautiful were all sides, as she murmured, "Who knows what may be beyond the bend in the road!" Late in the afternoon she was to the realization that the drive was nearly over, while she was carrying home no souvenirs of the trip. Hastily she set about repairing her mistake, but the sun was low, and the pictures were a failure.

The Free-Thought Movement Then and Now

YOUR editorial entitled, "A Pernicious Movement" is a timely warning of the attempt of the so-called "liberal party" (or Free Thought), to again advertise themselves through the medium of a World's Fair. The record which the so-called "Liberals," "Free Thinkers" and "Free Press" have made for themselves is rather a black mark across the pages of history. A few facts as to their past history will be an eye-opener to many of your readers.

In July, 1876, during the Centennial at Philadelphia, Pa., they held their Congress in connection with a national Exposition. They there organized as, "The National Liberal League," with a president, twenty-five vice-presidents, a secretary, assistant secretary, treasurer, board of directors consisting of five members, and an executive committee of twenty-two appointed members, with absent representatives of our communities not there present, to be appointed later. Their platform, as follows, was for months afterwards published under the names of the foregoing officials, in their official organs, as

"THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM"

"1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from just taxation.

"2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.

"3. We demand that all appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

"4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book, or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

"5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States, or by its government of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts, shall wholly cease.

"6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts, and in all departments of government shall be abolished.

"7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

"8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of 'Christian' morality shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

"9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end, shall be consistently, unflinchingly and promptly made."

His first Congress of "Liberals," was followed by gatherings of the Clans at Rochester, N. Y., where the burden of that Convention (as well as at others at Boston, Mass., Syracuse, N. Y., and other places), was the repeal of the five Acts of Congress, approved March 1873. One act prohibited the importation of vile books, pictures and articles for immoral use. Another declared all such matters non-mailable, and provided a penalty for depositing any of them in the mails. Another forbade the printing or disseminating of these matters in the District of Columbia, Territories, Provinces, over which Congress had exclusive jurisdiction. Another punished any government official for aiding or abetting this nefarious business, while the fifth authorized the search for and seizure of all immoral matter.

This Convention of the clans in Rochester was followed by a display of "Liberal" tactics against religion and morality in a most unscrupulous attempt to repeal the laws Congress had enacted in the interest of public morals. Liberals made history very fast. Liberal newspapers teemed with demands for repeal? They plotted to so blacken those who stood in the forefront in defence of the morals of the young, that the Committees of Congress would not respect nor hear them. They sent out thousands of circulars filled with libels against the writer of this article and misrepresentations concerning the law and its workings (publishing the law with words added to change its meaning and intent) to editors of the newspapers throughout the land. These circulars contained the names of reputable firms and persons, which had been forged, to add weight to this Liberal movement. Each circular was accompanied with a blank petition to be signed and sent to Congress. The leading organ of Liberalism and repeal congratulated Liberals in anticipation of their success, as follows:

With thousands of these petitions laid before Congress, backed by the efforts that will be made by persons of influence; with the exhibit of the dastardly and villainous conduct of special agent and representative of the Y. M. C. A., Anthony Comstock, we have reason to believe that success would eventually crown their efforts.

A "Liberal," whom I had once arrested for a felony, which we caught him in the act of committing, wrote a tissue of lies, to aid this Liberal movement, and which was adopted by the Liberal cohorts, entitled The Life and Crimes of Anthony Comstock. This was sent free to editors and publishers, to create adverse public sentiment in advance of the receipt of the petition in Congress. A petition said to contain 70,000 names and to have been 2,100 feet long, was presented to the House of Representatives at Washington in the early part of 1878. At the day appointed for a hearing, this liberal, libelous pamphlet, was liberally displayed upon news-stands in Washington, while piles of them were displayed in and about the rotunda and halls of the Capitol, with a card, on which were the words: "Free. Please take one." They were also laid upon every Congressman's table in both the House and Senate Chamber, and were displayed in the room of the Committee before whom the hearing was held.

Time will not permit me to detail the various other methods which were employed to repeal these laws. Civil suits were instituted in various cities, where I had made arrests under postal laws, to harass me. The morning of the hearing, papers in Washington and elsewhere contained a "Liberal" account (not a word of truth in it) of my having been arrested in four different districts, and that one District Attorney had eleven indictments against me. All these stories and more were disseminated to support their "Liberal" movement for repeal, and to embitter members of Congress against these laws and myself. Robert G. Ingersoll's name stood first upon the petition. It to-day stands first upon the records of that Congress, in the resolutions which that Committee unanimously adopted, denying the prayer of those conspirators against religion and morals.

The story of this "Liberal" conspiracy contains food for thoughtful minds. It was a victory won in the face of bitterest Liberal assaults upon law and individual, in answer to prayer to Almighty God. To his name be all the glory.

To Call a Peace Conference

To lovers of peace everywhere, it will be good news that there is a likelihood of the Hague Conference being reconvened at a distant date, when, in all probability, an effort will be made to bring about peace between Russia and Japan. When the Committee of the Interparliamentary Congress recently visited the President at Washington, F. M. Bartholdt, chairman, presented resolutions requesting the President to invite the nations to send representatives to a conference for (1) the negotiation of arbitration treaties, and (2) to create a Congress of Nations, to convene periodically for the discussion of international questions. The President, in the course of his reply, said:

"I shall, at an early date, ask the other nations to join in a second Congress at The Hague. At the first Conference at The Hague, several questions were left unsettled, and it was expressly provided that there should be a second Conference. A reasonable time has elapsed, and I feel that your body has shown sound judgment in concluding that a second Conference should now be held, to carry some steps farther toward completion the work of the first."

A Sunday Morning Talk at the Old Bowery Mission

A number of visitors occupy the platform with the superintendent and his corps of faithful workers.

Hymn after hymn is sung, each with an increasing heartiness, as all seem to get warmed up to the occasion. There is a life and cheer about the music which is contagious. The "stranger within the gates" sitting upon the platform, begins to wonder at some things he sees, and later his wonderment increases at what he hears. This is his first visit to the Mission—this old "Church of Sinners" he has heard so much about—but where are the "toughs," the "bums," the "men not worth saving," those who have thrown away all opportunities, and deliberately chosen the downward path? Yes, there are some men with faces which would not inspire much confidence; with features weak and flabby—men with evidences of heredity such as to almost make them seem hopeless. There are men with countenances seamed and lined, bearing the unmistakable mark of drink and dissipation, but all the scars and seams have not come from folly and crime, even in the worst faces. Many look almost hopeful after listening to a few motherly words from Mrs. Bird, and everyone, howsoever hard may be his lot, feels a welcome embodied in the kindly greeting she extends to "her boys."

After another song, the superintendent prays that "the dear Lord will give us all common sense," with other necessary blessings. The young stranger sees many heads bowed before him, and he is struck by the fact, that while many a man's garments might be rejected by any "ole clo" vender, even of the Bowery type, every man's hair is carefully combed, and his face clean, except for a needed shave. An air of expectation pervades the whole assembly, as if each man were anxiously waiting for something he could scarcely define. Yes, they are a pathetic lot.

Here is one who, perhaps, has come for the cup of hot coffee and sandwich, with no other hope or ambition, no wish or desire for anything else. He knows that no one asking for bread at the Bowery Mission will be given a stone. In spite of himself, he becomes interested; he hears, perhaps, for the first time, the Gospel of common sense, and he realizes what a fool he is and has been, that he alone is responsible for the miserable condition in which he finds himself. He is told, in unmistakable language, that the "heathen in his blindness" will have a much better chance of "squaring himself" at the judgment than he, if he continues to reject the Divine help so freely offered.

There is no splitting of theological hairs, no expounding of doctrines, no explaining of "isms," but a clear, logical talk from Mr. Halliwell, embodying the old, old story, that the Kingdom of God is not afar off, but within, and unless we get right within it, it makes but little difference what we are without. No man is truly converted who merely wants to get rid of his load of sin, because, the way of the transgressor has been found hard, and because he wants to have things easier, or because he has become tired, and wants to get a rest. No; no kneeling at penitent forms, even with tears and groans, and professed repentance, will avail. The test is love—love to God, and a desire to help others; a sinking of self, in the effort to do good instead of evil, to one's companions; the putting forth of a friendly hand; giving an encouraging word to the man next, who may be sinking beneath a heavy load, too heavy to be much longer endured. When the love of God once gets into a man's heart, how different everything looks, how changed the life, when the heart is renewed and filled with the love of God. When a man once comes face to face with what he really is, and what life in the past has meant for him, to whom can he look for help, to give him knowledge and strength, that he may turn his back on the old, and start on the new life? To whom but the sublime Hero of the strangest, sweetest story ever told—to Jesus, the Friend of the weary, to Him who came to call not the righteous, but sinners to repentance.

And no man stirred; every eye was on the speaker's face, as his voice rang out with hope, mercy and pardon, for every one, if he would only accept. The organ spoke even in its silence, of the influence exerted by the Mission over wayward men. From many faces there gleamed a ray of light, as if the men had indeed laid hold on the hope set before them in that hour, and at the meeting's close, many were inquiring the way to begin a better life, the way to let in the light, which had shone out of the darkness on this blessed Sunday morning at the Bowery Mission.

ENLARGING THE WORK*

ALL life comprehends activity and movement. If it does not increase and move forward, it will inevitably decrease and go backward. It is so in our agencies of Christian usefulness. They must be enlarged and improved, otherwise they will stagnate and deteriorate. It is, therefore, wise and timely that before the work of the winter begins, the question of the best methods of development be considered.

At the outset, the necessity of increasing the membership of the society is obvious. There is inspiration in numbers, and there is work for all that can be enlisted. "Come with us and we will do you good," is an invitation that should be pressed at this time by the members on outsiders. If an invitation is given at the right moment, the whole course of a lifetime may be decided and the cause of Christ have a helper instead of an opponent.

Plans for the meeting also need to be considered. How to make the meetings interesting and inspiring must occupy a prominent place in all discussions about the development of a society. There are some minds that find delight in the discussion of doctrine, but it is easy to devote too much time to the subject. The practical side of life, with its duties and aims, ought to occupy a prominent place in the programme, and might be so discussed as to have an influence on the conduct of every member.

Outside influence needs to be taken into account. Every community in which there is a young people's society, ought to be the better for it. There are many homes in the cities which might be brightened by a visit, many sick and invalid persons who would be cheered by an hour's sprightly talk, many struggling people who might be helped, without the expenditure of a cent, to bear their burdens more bravely. After all, the life here is a pressing consideration. We ought to be preparing for the life beyond the grave, but we follow our Lord's example when we take cognizance of the trials of people in this life and relieve their physical and material needs, as well as minister to the welfare of their souls. To take a little trouble to find employment for some one who is out of work, to give advice to some one who is in perplexity, to give encouragement to some one whose life is hard and bitter—is to follow in Christ's footsteps and continue his work in the world.

Besides all these, there is the missionary work. That lies all around us on every street. There are heathen near us as ignorant of Christ and the real meaning of Christianity as any savage in Africa. To reach these with an invitation to church, or with a simple testimony for Christ, might be the means of saving a soul. It would be easy to map out a city, and arrange to have two members appointed for each section who should visit non-churchgoers, and for the society to hire a pew in the church to which the persons invited might be conducted, and to have them welcomed when they come, which means much to the stranger. This work needs doing. It should not be possible for any one in this day to say, "No man careth for my soul."

LADY CURZON'S ILLNESS

ALL Americans have read with regret accounts of the dangerous illness of Lady Curzon, wife of the Viceroy of India. Since the time of Mrs. Mary Leiter's marriage to one of Britain's most distinguished noblemen, every one has been interested in the story of this young American woman's experience in her exalted position. Many international marriages, with money on the American side, and titles and position on the other, have proved a disastrous combination; but Lord Curzon and his lady have shown what such a union may result in, when principle and duty exist on both sides. It seems only a short time ago, since the great Durbar, with the Viceroy and Verine as the central figures, took place in India. Never in the history of that country of magnificent spectacles, had so leopard skins thrown across the saddles, surrounded the elephant.

Now the scene has changed. In her chamber in Walmer Castle in Kent, a woman lies silently fighting with death, while a pale-faced man watches at her bedside. All that medical science can do has been called into requisition to save the life of the good and beautiful woman, who has endeared herself to so many hearts. Five of the most eminent physicians of England and France have been in attendance since the beginning of her illness.

Lady Curzon has taken great interest in improving the condition of East India's women. Some years ago she took up the work inaugurated by Lady Dufferin for the establishment of hospitals at various places, for the benefit of women and children. It has proved a very successful movement, and there are now a large number of hospitals and dispensaries in charge of women doctors. A large number of native girls have been and are being trained as nurses in these hospitals. Government social functions are now rid of the very debasing influence of dancing-girls, through Lady Curzon's influence. She has done much to encourage native industries. Certain arts that had nearly died out have been re-established, and others have been greatly improved and developed.

Lady Curzon has not been well since the birth of a daughter, early last spring. A recent long automobile ride, and fright, attendant upon a dog jumping upon her as she was sitting in a park, resulted in grave physical complications, and for a number of days her life hung by a thread. Oxygen was administered, and on Sept. 27 a slight change for the better was observed, and the crisis passed. The improvement, however, was very slight and very slow, and the patient not out of danger.

Lord Curzon has been constantly at the bedside of his wife ever since her illness assumed a dangerous character. Sir Thomas Barlow, one of the chief physicians attendant upon Lady Curzon, is very hopeful of her ultimate recovery.

During Mrs. Leiter's voyage on the Vaterland she was kept informed of her daughter's condition by wireless telegraphy. The friends on both sides of the Atlantic, and the many who know her for her widespread benevolences, unite in heartfelt desire for her speedy recovery.

Mrs. H. A., LaGrange, Ill. "I wish to add my thanks to the 'Answered Prayer' column, for the gift it gives. I want to thank my Heavenly Father for answered prayers."

Mrs. C. L. R., Red Bank, Miss. "I have a pining mother, who 'carried everything to God in prayer.' While life lasts I could not forget it. The Lord has answered many prayers. I was in deep trouble; he had compassion on me, and I believe he will fully deliver me."

Mrs. E. W. L., Glenwood, Iowa. "I wish to add testimony to the wonderful mercy of our God in hearing and answering the prayers of his children. Through a long life, his promises have been fulfilled to me many times. He never fails those who put their trust in him."

M. S., Umpire, Ark. "I have had many prayers answered in a manner not to be mistaken. God has answered when none but God could help, when it was impossible for human aid to reach me. God always removes my trouble or gives me grace to bear it with Christian fortitude."

Y., Van Wert, O. "If it is God's will, I have a great desire to become well and do work for the Master. The Bible says, 'The prayers of the righteous avail much.' I long for an interest in your prayers, and also of the entire CHRISTIAN HERALD family. I feel to praise God for what he has already done for me in answering prayer."

S. J. W., Vermont. "I have had causes for anxiety, but God has overruled them for good; I am still trusting my Heavenly Father."

Battle of the Scottish Churches

At Mr. Andrew Carnegie's town, Dunfermline, where he was born, there has been strong talk. At a special meeting of Dunfermline and Kinross United Free Presbytery, a resolution was passed in favor of abiding loyally by the union, and encouraging their people to do the same. An emphatic protest was recorded against the decision of the House of Lords, as violating all the principles of equity, and the members affirmed their determination to face suffering and sacrifice rather than abandon or hold in abeyance the freedom for which the Church contended at the disruption, and for the exercise of which the Free Church portion of the United Free Church has been despoiled of funds and properties, contrary to the destination intended by the donors.

Both sides in the great Church dispute declare they are sincerely anxious to discover some means of compromise; but the most disagreeable fact of the dispute still remains, owing to the fact that the Free Church insists upon having some guarantee as to the character of the doctrines to be taught from the pulpits, and professorial chairs of the churches and colleges, while the United Free Church scouts the very idea of giving any such undertaking. Accordingly, the latter goes on collecting money for its immediate expenses, the fund now having reached a figure considerably over £60,000, representing the contributions of about three weeks. It has also initiated a gigantic campaign all through Scotland to encourage the faithful in their adherence to the principles of spiritual freedom.

On their part, the "Wee Frees" (as the Free Church people are called), are issuing an appeal to all the charges in the United Free Church, affirming that they have no desire to oust any congregation from its property, and that a congregation has only to signify its adherence to the Free Church principles, to be left in undisturbed possession of its church and manse.

Several prominent American clergymen are taking active part in the controversy. One of the most distinguished Americans in Scotland, at the time of the decision, was Rev. Professor Henry Van Dyke, of Princeton. He immediately wrote to the United Free Church as follows:

You know how deep is my interest in the present crisis in Scotland. Much more than Presbyterianism is at stake. The freedom of the Gospel, the vitality of the Church, the power of Christianity to act in the present, and to grow for the future; these, it seems to me, are the things that are called in question, and for these things the United Free Church must and will stand fast, not in a spirit of contention; not with words of wrath, but with charity for all, with malice towards none.

Another American who is taking active interest in the controversy is the Rev. David Gregg, President of the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church. In a letter published here, Rev. Gregg makes a practical proposal, offering to keep professors and students of the United Free Church. He writes:

If the proposition be entertained, I have it in my mind to raise the money for the transportation out and back of a number of your professors, and as many of the students as will come, and also for the provision of homes during the season. If you should overcrowd us, there are others of our seminaries who will be glad to swing wide open their doors to the young men. A new bond would be established between the brethren on the east and west of the great waters, and a larger Christian union would grow out of this providence.

As for the way in which Foreign Missions are at present affected by the decision, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will probably be interested in the following statement given to me by the Rev. Dr. Geo. Robson, editor of the Missionary Record of the United Free Church:

The Free Church is specially desirous that, pending permanent arrangements, foreign missions should take no detriment from the existing situation. The terms of the House of Lords' judgment, require that the administration of property covered by the judgment shall be confided to trustees, but we gladly recommend that these trustees should apply the whole funds for the present to existing missions formerly of the Free Church, provided they are satisfied that only the simple Gospel is being preached by the missionaries, and that the dogmatic teaching objected to on the question in controversy is excluded. A meeting of the Foreign Missions Committee of the United Free Church was held in Edinburgh. The Rev. Principal Miller, of Madras, an ex-Moderator of the Free Church, asserted for himself and all Indian missionaries, that they desired to carry on the mission work of the United Free Church. He felt certain that the missionaries of all evangelical churches would approve that course. Fourteen other missionaries present, representing missions in India, South Africa, Livingstonia, and other places, spoke in similar terms.

My interviews with those identified with the decision and with the heads of the two Churches, were, on the Free Church side, as follows.

Lord Davey, one of the majority of five Lords who gave the decision, said:

The Law Committee of the Free Church have issued a memorandum which they hope may conduce towards relieving the immediate pressure of the situation. It would ill become, the memorandum states, the Free Church to grudge to their brethren, formerly members of the Free Church who have gone into the United Church, the fullest measure of sympathy to which they are entitled in the situation in which they now find themselves. Especially is such sympathy due to the large number of the rank and file of the Church, who, having relied upon the mistaken assurances of their leaders, now find themselves unexpectedly involved in the present crisis.

Mr. J. Hay Thorburn, Secretary of the Free Church, said:

The Free Church stands pledged to welcome to her fold all ministers, office-bearers, and people whose sincere desire it is to abide by or return to their adherence to the principles and standards of the Church; and the Commission will welcome communications from all such. Indications are not wanting that many United Free Church members will accept the invitation to join the Free Church.

My interviews on the United Free Church side were as follows: Lord Macnaghten, one of the minority of two lords against the decision, said:

The condition of Church affairs in Scotland, above all, the condition of the United Free Church, is such as must not only excite the interest, but attract the sympathy of every one who considers it. The blow which has suddenly fallen on a great ecclesiastical institution, doing great and good work, not only in Scotland but abroad, the probable closing of churches and colleges, and the uprooting of the ministers and their families from their manses—all these and many attendant circumstances are grievous to contemplate.

Lord Overtoun said that, personally, he considered the decision an outrage.

Dr. R. G. Balfour, a relative of Prime Minister Balfour, in conversation, expressed himself strongly regarding the decision. He said it was a technical decision on the Church as a "trust," but it led to the most perfectly preposterous conclusions.

Rev. Dr. Geo. Robson (now editor of the Missionary Record), before referred to, ex-Moderator of the United Free Church General Assembly, said the matter was serious, but it might be the means of a great awakening and spiritual revival in the Church.

One member of the United Free Church in Edinburgh said that the property given to the Free Church will prove a huge "white elephant." He said:

The effects of the judgment of the House of Lords upon the financial position of the United Free Church are unconsciously, no doubt—being vastly exaggerated. Speaking generally, the judgment affects: General trust funds, the income of which is about £30,000; and certain properties consisting of about 1,100 churches, 700 or 800 manses, three colleges, the Assembly Hall, the general offices of the church, etc. As regards the properties, the United Free Church will ultimately not lose these. They are at present undoubtedly a huge white elephant in the hands of the Free Church, and that Church has no alternative but to go to Parliament for an Act to relieve them of the custody of the great animal that has been so suddenly put under their care by the House of Lords.

Further, there is the obligation upon the new trustees to fire and keep clean 1,100 empty churches, and 700 or 800 empty manses. Can they attempt to raise even by June 30 next, a capital sum of hundreds of thousands of pounds, and can they raise an annual income of tens of thousands of pounds, for the sole purpose of locking out of 1,100 churches the people who have found, in many cases, 99 or even 100 per cent. of the money to build them?

WAR ON OPIUM AND ALCOHOL

THE Japanese Minister at Washington, M. Takahira, has sent to his government the proposal which the International Reform Bureau is about to send out to Christian statesmen all over the world, that international public opinion, a new and mighty force of our time, be rallied to re-enforce public sentiment in the British Empire in favor of releasing China from treaty obligations to tolerate traffic in opium after the close of the present Russo-Japanese war. Politicians seem to regard international guarantee of the integrity of China as of supreme importance; but of importance also both to China and the world, is the question of protecting China against moral and physical disintegration from within, through opium.

At the time of the Boxer outbreak, twenty-two American missionary societies presented a petition to the American Government, urging it to employ its influence to end the opium traffic in China; but it probably seemed inopportune for a friendly government to press England on such a matter during the Boer war, which shortly followed.

That petition, however, will now be brought to the attention of Secretary Hay, by an influential committee appointed by the International Reform Bureau, consisting of its trustees resident in Washington and the "native races" deputation, whose chairman is Dr. F. E. Clark, of the Endeavor Society. They will probably call on the Secretary at the same time to suggest that the conclusion of the present Eastern war is likely to be the most opportune time to aid China to emancipation from opium.

The writer had an interview with Mr. Wu Ting Fang, when the latter was Chinese Minister to the United States, and was positively assured that even though China is itself raising much opium at the present time, yet the formal prohibition of opium by the Chinese Government would be immediately restored, if the opium treaty with Great Britain should be withdrawn. It is estimated that one hundred millions of the Chinese (one-fourth of all the families), are under the blight of opium.

Before the present war broke out, the Premier of Japan had sent to the Reform Bureau, through the Legation at Washington, for all the literature of this crusade against the sale of opium and liquors to native races, and the matter had been favorably taken up by Dr. DeForest and other missionaries in Japan, with the appropriate member of the Japanese cabinet. These negotiations were broken off by the war, but will doubtless be renewed when the war is concluded. It is thought that the pressure of international public opinion upon the British Government, especially that which comes from the two most friendly powers, Japan and the United States, with the strong sentiment already existing in the British Empire in favor of the abolition of the opium treaty, may reasonably be expected to succeed, especially if the attention of the Christian Church all over the world can be focussed upon the subject.

A kindred proposal of the International Reform Bureau, which has been passed in the form of a resolution by the United States Senate and endorsed by the President, invites all nations to unite in a world treaty to prohibit the sale of intoxicants and opium to the uncivilized nations. China is not included in this effort, but it is a part of the great movement to protect what are called the native races against the white man's rum and opium traffic. Another matter is the extensive exportation of American beer to countries hitherto almost free from intemperance, which has already had a very unfavorable effect upon Spanish peoples, and Oriental nations. These two reforms it is now proposed to press to victory.

A recent inquiry sent out by the International Reform Bureau to all countries as to whether the liquor traffic was increasing, showed that the only commonwealth in which the liquor traffic is not on the increase is the Congo Free State.

Training for the Mission Field

AT the Los Angeles, Calif., Training School for Christian Workers, under the auspices of Friends, there is now collected a band of over sixty persons, who have come together from various States. This is the third band of faith missionaries under the leadership of Rev. Horace W. Houlding, for the mission field in South Chih-li, N. China.

Some thirty missionaries have already entered this field since 1901. Three years ago the first band of seventeen began work there. This movement, which is interdenominational, has missionary representatives in China, India, the Philippines, and Guatemala. This Training School has a debt of $2,500, which the management is endeavoring, with the help of friends, to liquidate. The President is I. H. Cammack, No. 111 South Figueroa Street, Los Angeles.

We do Half your Washing Free of Cost

YOU must pay the washer-woman fifteen cents an hour. It is hard-earned money at that. If you do your own washing, or have the servant do it, this steaming, back-breaking, hand-chapping, cold-catching, temper-destroying work will cost you more than 15 cents an hour, in the end.

It takes eight hours of hard labor to do the average family wash. Eight hours, at 15 cents, costs you $1.20 per week for washing. This means $66.40 per year, without reckoning fuel for fires, or wear on clothes. We will save you half of that—or No Pay. We will send you our "1900" Washing Machine on a full month's free trial. It runs on ball-bearings like a bicycle, and it works with motor-springs. These motor-springs do most of the hard work. You can sit in a rocking-chair and make them do the washing—think of that! We don't want a cent of your money, nor a note, nor a contract, when we ship you the Washer on trial. We even pay all of the freight out of our own pockets, so that you may test the machine as much as you like before you agree to buy it. Use it a full month at our expense. If you don't find it does better washing, in half the time—send it back to the railway station, with our address on it—that's all. We will then pay the freight back, too, without a murmur. But, if the month's test convinces you that our "1900" Washer actually does 8 hours washing in 4 hours time—does it twice as easy—far better, without wearing the clothes, breaking a button, or tearing a thread of lace, then you must write and tell us so.

From that time on you must pay us, every week, part of what our machine saves you, say 50 cents per week till the Washer is paid for.

Each "1900" Washer lasts at least five years, yet a very few months, at 50 cents a week, makes it entirely your own, out of what it saves you on each washing.

Every year our Washer will save you about $33.00 that you would have had to spend for labor of your own, or the labor of others.

In five years each machine saves its owner about $165.00. Yet the "1900" Washer won't cost you a cent under our plan, because we let it pay for itself. You need not take our word for that. We let you prove all we say, at our expense, before you decide to buy it on these terms.

Could we risk the freight both ways, with thousands of people, if we did not know our "1900" Washer would do all we claim for it?

It costs you only the two-cent stamp, on a letter to us, to bring this quick and easy Washer to your door, on a month's trial.

That month's free use of it will save you about $2.00. You thus risk nothing but the postage stamp to prove our claims, and we practically pay you $2.00 to try it.

This offer may be withdrawn at any time if it crowds our factory.

Therefore write TO-DAY, while the offer is open, and while you think of it. A post card will do.

Address me personally for this offer, viz.:

R. F. Bieber, General Manager of the "1900" Washer Company, 192 Henry Street, Binghamton, N. Y.

HEALED AND HUMBLLED

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

TO those who know little of the ways of God, it may seem strange that in order to put special honor upon two individuals—Naaman and his wife's little Jewish maid—God must permit the one to become a leper and the other a slave! Do not pity children of God who may be called to pass through deep suffering. Accepted from the hand of God, it becomes the way to glory. "Heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with him; that we may be also glorified together" (Rom. 8: 17). Who told this little maid that Elisha had power to heal the leper? No such case of healing had taken place in Israel. "Many lepers were in Israel in the time of Elisha the prophet; and none of them was cleansed save Naaman the Syrian" (Luke 4: 27). This girl must have known the prophet; she had seen and heard how, whenever he was appealed to in the time of need, he could always fall back upon the resources of the God whom he served, and before whom he continually stood, to minister unto him, and to do his bidding. Through him she knew the heart of God, and she spoke these words to her mistress with assurance (II. Kings 5: 1-14).

But must there not have been in the character, in the words and deeds of this girl, something unusual, that any notice should be taken of what she said? Must there not have been in her life and service something similar to that of Joseph, when his heathen master "saw that the Lord was with him" (Gen. 39: 3)? Her words were repeated to Naaman, who thought it worth while to acquaint the king with them. The words of a slave! So man would say. The words of an acquaintance with the living God! So would speak one who knew him. It was God who gave weight to those words; they were to lead to a manifestation of his power.

The king of Syria took up the matter. It was of importance to him that Naaman should be healed. Perhaps it did not much matter to him how, but the fact that he made the matter one of royal interposition was evidence that he took this matter to heart. His letter, however, to Jehoram, king of Israel, was only taken amiss; God, the King of kings, had already undertaken it, and the issues were decided at a Higher Court. All man's preparations for the healing of Naaman proved abortive; Benhadad's letter to the king of Israel, the ten talents of silver, the six thousand pieces of gold, the ten changes of raiment, which were prepared as the fee, were all useless. Kings must learn that when God is in question, their resources are valueless.

Everything seemed calculated to annoy and discourage Naaman. No state reception—he was a leper! No word from the king but his unworthy suspicion of foul play. What next? Elisha heard that the king had rent his clothes, and that Naaman had come to him, and what his errand was, and he sent to king Jehoram, saying, "Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? Let him come now to me, and he shall know [what thou seemest to have forgotten] that there is a prophet in Israel." So Naaman came with his horses and with his chariot—yes, and with his leprosy—and stood at the door of the house of Elisha. Naaman was unused to neglect. Leper, though he was, he was the honored and appreciated of king and people in his own land. And when the king of Israel dismissed him, the insult must have been difficult to bear. But when, at the prophet's door, Elisha only sent a messenger to him, saying, "Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again to thee, and thou shalt be clean," his wrath knew no bounds.

But Naaman had some faithful servants, who came near and expostulated with him. Blessed servants who will be true to their master! Blessed master who is wise enough to learn from true-hearted servants! He took the rebuke, and humbled himself; came down out of his chariot, and dipped the seven times required in the despised waters of the Jordan.

Deaf People Now Hear Whisper

Wireless Telephones Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Like Eye-Glasses.

Another Marconi heard from. He makes the Deaf hear distinctly. He has invented little wireless telephones, so in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them. And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight.

Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers. They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain from them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds, can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off. And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear they are not felt even when the head rests on pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

These little telephones make it as easy for a person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them, the better his hearing grows, because they rest, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak from straining is like resting a strained wrist working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by taking the sounds louder, so it is easier to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without strain. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious on the face of a deaf person.

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound so hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. We make the drum vibrate ten times as much as make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick where in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noise in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and overcome after Ear Doctors have given up the cases, by use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Factories—four hundred people of all ranks who are Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, but be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 350 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it to-day. Don't off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

Write for it to-day to the Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1903 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

Each issue is filled with splendid stories, beautiful engravings, special departments of Floriculture, Fancy-work, Fashions, Household, Health and Beauty, Poultry, Garden, etc.

There is a reason why THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE has more than double the number of subscribers that any other publication in the world has: if a reader of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE wishes to know anything about the latest styles, THAT month's issue gives them; if some bug is destroying her plants, THAT month's issue tells her what it is and how to get rid of it; if fruits are to be preserved, THAT month's issue tells all about them. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always tells its readers what they want to know at right time. From 96 to 138 columns each issue of splendid pictures, interesting stories, useful information: Flowers, the Garden, Lace Making, Embroidery (with new and beautiful patterns each month that any woman can make), Cooking Recipes, Fashions, Poultry, Pies, Household Decoration, Pyrography, Curious Facts, Health and Beauty columns; each issue supplies reading for the whole family.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE never permits misleading advertisements to appear in its columns and absolutely protects its readers so that they are not defrauded by catch-penny schemes. No whiskey or nasty medical ads. are ever seen in the columns of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. It is clean, wholesome and bright. A single issue is worth more than the whole year's subscription. We wish every home in America to receive THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and in order that it may go into your home, we will send you THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and if you do not like it after you have received it for three months, we will return your 10 cents and stop sending it. You will have had it three months for nothing. Aluminum Oil Heaters

A WHOLE YEAR FOR 10 CENTS

Made in Several Sizes And All Equipped With Safety Burners

Smokeless, odorless, safe, durable, light, convenient—a furnace for heat. Radiate heat all over, top sides and bottom just like a base burner. This is because of a partition in the center of the drum which deflects the heat downward. This partition is only made possible by our grand Safety Burner. No other Oil Heater has this Safety Burner, or can so radiate heat. Simple in operation as a lamp, and much safer. The oil in the fount is never in direct contact with the wick, thus overheating and explosions are impossible.

Any child can take out and replace the Wick in a couple of minutes without any trouble.

Note the Construction of Our Safety Burner as illustrated above. See the generous Air Passages which insure perfect combustion and complete safety.

A—Flame spreader free from perforations (no oily residuum or dirt or clogging-up, therefore no odor is possible). B—Air Space outside of Wick Tube. C—Air Space inside of Wick Tube. D—Wick. E—Outside Casing to Burner. F—Air Space between Fount and Outer Casing. G—Fount for oil, entirely separate from Burner, oil fed to Wick by small tube. H—Feed Pipe conducting oil from Fount to Burner. I—Shield resting on top of Fount with Air Space underneath.

The Aluminum Oil Heater is a handsome stove, supreme in practical merit. It can easily be carried from room to room. The flat top is adapted for heating water, "steeping the tea" and other domestic purposes—and it is always safe. Dare you use an Oil Heater without our Safety Burner?

Our "Lord's Day" Symposium

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS EXPRESS THEIR VIEWS REGARDING SABBATH OBSERVANCE

TO the question recently propounded: "Should Sunday be a day for Feasting or for Fasting? Is our present home observance of the Lord's Day what it should be?" a very large number of answers have been received. All phases of the discussion are touched upon in the letters which appear below:

Keep the Sabbath Holy

The Sabbath was God's day in our home. Attendance on Sunday School and Church was never questioned. We went, we sat together in the family pew. The afternoon was spent in learning the next Sabbath's lesson, some catechism, a hymn (which we afterwards sung), and then a little quiet recreation in the shady back yard. We knew it was "Sunday in the backyard," but the idea was that we were not to disturb others. So far from causing a reaction, as claimed by some, it gave us such a habit of Sabbath observance that we have never been able to overcome it. I love the Sabbath, and the memory of the dear mother who taught us to "keep it holy." S. Los Angeles, Cal.

No Sabbath in the Kitchen

On the Sabbath no business should be permitted to occupy the brains and tongue too much. Private devotion, studying the Scriptures, singing God's praises, the family collectively conversing upon God's goodness, are all to be commended; but if we stop there, we fall short of Christ's ideal. We should so use the Sabbath that every one may have the same privilege we ourselves enjoy. There are too many so-called Christians who demand that their servants work all day on the Sabbath, when they have no right whatsoever to make such a demand. Christ's greatest command is, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." The Sabbath was made for man, and as God is no respecter of persons, motormen, conductors, kitchenmaids and cooks should be included. Pittsburgh, Pa. J. PAGE.

Approves the American Sabbath

Sunday is a day for neither feasting nor fasting; but rather a day for resting—for the rebuilding of worn out muscle and brain. In order that one accomplish this end, it is not necessary that he either feast or fast. In regard to the home observance of the Lord's day, I should say it is quite what it should be in the church-going American family, being passed in religious reading, music, and sociable family conversation. Brewster, N. Y. LEON LEWIS HADDEN.

What the Bible Says on the Subject

Our Lord wrote for our guidance, with his own finger on stone, Deut. 5: 22, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Ex. 20: 8-11. Ex. 16: 23-30. Ex. 31: 12-18. Ex. 35: 1-3. Num. 15: 32-36. Isa. 66: 23. Ezekiel 20: 12, 13-31. Nehemiah 13: 15-22. Matt. 12: 1, 2, 5, 8, 10, 11, 12; 24: 20, end of this age; 28: 1. Mark 1: 21; 2: 23-28; 3: 2-4; 6: 2; 15: 42; 16: 1, 2. Luke 4: 16-31; 6: 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 9, 13; 10: 14, 15, 16; 14: 1, 3, 5; 23: 54; 56: 24; 1. John 5: 9, 10, 16, 18; 7: 22, 23; 9: 14, 16; 20: 19, 26. Acts 13: 14, 27, 42, 44; 18: 4; 17: 2; 16: 13; 15: 21; 20: 7, 16. 1 Cor. 16: 2. Rev. 1: 10. Col. 2: 16, 17. Acts 2: 1. Jeremiah 17: 21-27; 11: 3, 4; 5: 19. Ex. 15: 26. Hamilton, Ont. C. HENDERSON.

Reconsecrate the Sabbath

Sunday should be a day given wholly to the Lord in worship, the day set apart in the Church for "Holy Communion" with the Saints, and spiritual life and light for all Christian disciples. The present home observance of the Lord's day is what it should be, when touched by the power of divine love, and drawn by the Shepherd's call, "Come unto me." To conform more closely to the Christian idea, there must be greater unity, reconsecration as a means of grace, to bring upon each individual the duty they owe to God, themselves, and the Church. Sheridan, Mont. MRS. FRANCES I. MCCREA.

Are We Adopting the European Sabbath?

The European Sabbath is too prevalent. Among church-goers irreverence for God's day is increasing. Hallowed hours are profaned by worldly conversation to the exclusion of religious subjects; thus the mind is diverted from things spiritual. Religious literature is neglected for the secular. It is also desecrated by amusements and traveling for convenience. Jesus disapproved of such traveling even in time of approaching calamity. Matthew 24: 20. God's precepts are to "honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words." Isaiah 58: 13-14. Obedience is the condition of realizing the promises annexed. A CALIFORNIAN.

How to Observe the "Rest Day."

So far as my observation goes, we are not observing in the homes of Christians the Sabbath day as God intended. It should be neither a day of feasting or fasting. Preparations should be made on Saturday that will make the dinner both attractive and palatable. Then, with uplifting reading, the "rest day" should be a time of recuperation, each member of the home having a tender regard for Him who said: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." ELIZABETH T. BELKNAP. Campville, N. Y.

An Aged Christian's Observance.

Let us each use rational common sense guided by Jehovah's wisdom, for which all true Christians daily ask. I eat but two plain meals on Sunday of the simplest food, that will not require any one's labor to prevent Church attendance, and although nearly seventy years old and hardly able to walk far, I do walk to the experience or class meeting at 10, stay to regular service at 10:30 and from 12 to 1 enjoy the Sunday School service in the Bible class. At night I go in time for the Epworth League—a most delightful service, and stay through the night service till 9 or 9:30, according to the interest manifested. Sunday is not a labor day and we do not need as much food, so the less of cooking and preparation in the home the better for the body, heart and mind rest required, and that is so necessary for our peace and happiness. Kearney, Neb. MOSES H. SUYDENHAM.

Parents Responsible for Sabbath Breaking

Sunday feasting is all wrong, for it keeps those from church service that would be glad to attend if it were not for the extra work of the day. The present home observance of the Lord's day is certainly not what it should be, and the only way it can be made to conform more closely to the Christian idea, is for the fathers and mothers to so live that their example may be followed in attending church service, and living pure Christian lives. Then they will not want to make Sunday a day of feasting and merry-making, but will "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it Holy." Stephentown Center, N.Y. EDITH COLEMAN.

There Should Be no Secular Work

Any day would be a fit day to conduct a feast except the "Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Ex. 20: 8, 11. The Sabbath was given as a sign between God and his people, and they were commanded "to keep it holy." Isa. 58: 13 tells us how to use it. It is a day of worship and spiritual rest. It is the Sabbath of Eden. So secular work can be done on any day except the seventh day. Hilarity and feasting should not be done on the Lord's day, which is the seventh day. Logan, Kan. READER.

Our Home Observance Faulty

Plain, easily-cooked meals should be prepared, and all unnecessary work avoided, in order to give the housekeeper an opportunity to attend Divine service. Certainly our present home observance of the Lord's day in general is far from what it should be. During the summer, at least, some of our churches are very slimly attended. Where are the people? Many of them are away pleasure-seeking, visiting acquaintances, and indulging in gossip and amusement, instead of "remembering the Sabbath day to keep it holy." It is certainly the duty of every true Christian to seek both by example and precept, to prevent this increasing desecration of the Lord's day. Both the pulpit and press should speak out plainly and fearlessly. ANNIE RODD. Charlottetown, P. E. I.

The Ideal Sabbath

Neither a day for feasting nor for fasting, but a day for rest and worship. A day when our souls lay off the habiliment of the strenuous life, and worship in the church if possible; if not, wherever we are, we should turn our hearts toward God for spiritual renewing. It should be a day of gladness and joy, of home-coming for the absent, but not of feasting, though we would have for the table some favorite dish that could be made ready the day before. We should put all labor and earthly care aside, and make it truly "the Lord's day," meet to claim the blessing of his promise. Isa. 58: 13, 14. "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words. Then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it." Montpelier, Vt. M. R. D. DINGWALL.

Some Practical Suggestions

Somewhere in the ocean of Sunday School music, an old song is drifting with this refrain: For God hath made the Sabbath The brightest day of all.

There must be no odds and ends of unfinished business to clean up on Sunday. Then, if we wish, we may enjoy an hour's extra rest on Sunday morning, and so begin the day refreshed in body. Reduce household duties and all supposed necessary tasks to their lowest terms. Serve plain, wholesome food. The elaborate Sunday dinner sins against both soul and body. The Christian life is not a funeral procession, and its sacred day should not be a season of lamentation. Put into our Sunday morning prayer ten times the usual amount of thanksgiving. "With joy we draw water from the wells of salvation," temporal and spiritual. Make our places of worship cheerful. "Let the sunshine in." This does not mean ostentation in furnishings, raiment or ritual. Simplicity is one prime factor in the beautiful. Every Christian worshiper should wear a smile, if he or she has no other jewel. Every greeting should be whole-hearted. Every sermon should overflow with love, for where love abounds there joy abides. So, let us "worship the Lord in the beauty" and the joy "of holiness." While Sunday visiting must be condemned, yet a portion of the day, not otherwise employed, may be spent in joyous social intercourse with relatives, intimate friends and neighbors, and Christian associates. So, an afternoon in the park, or a stroll in the fields, cannot be denied to those who are shut up in office, store or shop. Sunlight and pure air are among God's choicest gifts, and we should accept them in the same loving spirit. The children should spend the day with the family, entering into its activities, and thus among their earliest impressions catching its spirit. If it is truly bright and joyful they will quickly learn to love it. If they do not, find out why. This will test our wisdom, and try our patience. This means that they should be taken to church. We expect the Christian Sabbath to remain among us a national institution the children must be trained to honor it. Port Byron, Ill. JOHN G. OSBORN.

Lovers of Pleasure as Sabbath-breakers

Read and study the Bible. Meet with brethren to edify one another. Attend to the sick and needy. Attend the church services. Attend the Sunday School. "Remember to keep holy the Sabbath day." "My Sabbaths shall ye keep; it shall be a sign between me and you throughout your generations; a covenant I make between me and you forever." No Sabbath-breaker has a sign between himself and his God. No Sabbath-breaker has a covenant between himself and his God. No Christian can be guiltless who makes use of a public conveyance on a Sunday, and thereby rob the employees of their rest day. No Christian can be in his place at a Sunday excursion. To be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God is high-handed treason. Sabbath desecration is one of the sins which caused the destruction of Jerusalem of old. Morris Park, L. I. R. D.

No Sunday Work or Big Dinners

Sunday should be a day of fasting and serving God. God says, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Jesus said, "If you love me, keep my commandments." When we were walking with the world we would run our harvester on Sunday and go to big dinners; but since we have been walking with Jesus, we won't shave, nor black our shoes, nor go to big dinners on Sunday, nor do anything we can do on Saturday. We go to the Lord's house as often as possible to have our spiritual strength renewed and our souls fed. Guthrie Centre, Ia WM. TESKEY.

The Sunday Newspaper Desecrates It

Sunday should not be a day of fasting. It should be the most joyful day of all the week, on account of the event it commemorates. It should not be a day of feasting, lest the solemn joy of "that glad day" be in a measure desecrated by an over-indulgence of the fleshly appetite. But it should be a day of thanks and rest. It does not seem to me that the observance of this sacred day is, in many homes, what it should be. Certain homes have come under my observation where both parents are church members, and yet the Sunday newspaper comes every Lord's day, with its page of Monday bargains and its page of funny stories and comic pictures, and the children are allowed to spend the sacred moment reading that nonsense. The only way to conform to the Christian idea, so far as I see, is to obey God's command as set forth in his Word, Isa. 58: 13, 14. Norwood, N. Y. MRS. F. A. HAMLIN.

Dinners and Popular Music Condemned

Sunday should neither be a feast day nor a day of fasting. Let us strike a happy medium in all things. The main goal of Christianity should be to fulfil Christ's definition of eternal life—"to know God," and on the Lord's day we should seek an attitude of rest, meditation and devotion, which can be best brought about by church attendance, Sunday School work and friendly intercourse with kind Christians. So much entertaining with dinners and afternoons of music (mostly popular), such as we find in many homes, is conducive to the development of the individual life, and tends to exclude a quietness the needs one day out of the week. C. E. CASPER. Alpena, Mich.

Relief from Household Care and Labor

I think that our present home observance of the Lord's day, as it is found in the average church-going American family, is not what it should be. But I do not think that Sunday should be a day either for feasting or for fasting. The entertainment of company on the Sabbath, Sunday dinners, etc., as is too often the custom of many Christian homes, involves care and anxiety on the part of the housewife, and much work on the part of the church-going family. The day should be charged with the care and service of the dining-room and kitchen. Besides, it gives the day the coloring of a holiday. Sunday, therefore, should not be made a day of feasting. On the other hand, such ample provision for the Sabbath should be made as the day previous as would secure the greatest possible relief from household care and labor. The attendance upon public worship, and engaging in some department of church work is essential to religious life and development. These privileges, therefore, should not be denied the housewife or cook, but should be as open to them as it is possible to make. In the home observance of the Lord's day, social intercourse should be carefully guarded. At least a portion of the day should be devoted to the discussion of such topics, reading of such religious books or literature, and the engaging in such thoughtful meditation, as would serve to remind us of God's work in Creation, from which he rested on the seventh day, and of his work in redemption through the only begotten Son, in which he arose from the dead on the first day of the week. I think such observance is practicable. Macon, Ga. R. F. BURDEN.

"A Good Deal of Liberty" After Church

God made man and made man make the Sabbath. It existed long before the Ten Commandments. Its purpose seems to be to give man time to think of something besides the grind of getting a living and in which to improve his higher nature, and is to be used by each person as each shall choose, so long as such one shall not injure his neighbor. The writer thinks that after a church service at Sunday School in the forepart of the day, a good deal of liberty should be allowed to be taken for the remainder of the day. Neither fasting or feasting, nor any violent or incontinent bodily or mental exercise, everything being temperate. Wm. E. MANN. Norfolk, Mass.

More Time for Church-going

Our present home observance of the Lord's Day in the average church-going American family is not what it should be. Little children can be taught to understand the importance of the one day of rest. The Sunday dinner could be amply provided for on Saturday, giving mothers and servants time for church-going, and resting weary bodies. Whoever will observe the Sabbath day will find they are better able to accomplish the six days' work. MRS. H. A. GREEN. Sheldon, Mo.

MEETING OF THE PEACE CONGRESS

OVER seven hundred delegates and a very large number of spectators assembled in historic Tremont Temple, Boston, on the afternoon of October 3, the occasion being the first session of the thirteenth International Peace Congress. The interior of the building was beautifully decorated, and in the organ-loft was a large portrait of the late Senator Hoar, a lifelong friend and advocate of peace. In the audience were many men and women distinguished in various walks of life, in both Europe and America—statesmen, authors, high officials and others. A Committee on Organization was appointed, and Mr. Edwin D. Mead, one of the leaders of the Peace movement in New England, was chosen as temporary chairman.

Mr. Mead introduced as the first speaker before the congress, the Hon. John Hay, Secretary of State, who addressed the great gathering. He welcomed the foreign delegates to the Western World. He declared peace to be the national policy of the American people. "We have had," he said, "a greater relative immunity from war than any of our neighbors. All our greatest men have been earnest advocates of peace. The very men who founded our liberties with the mailed hand, detested and abhorred war as the most futile and ferocious of human follies." He declared the present incumbent of the Executive office to be a consistent friend of peace, as was his predecessor. "Our government sent to the Hague Peace Court the best men we have in civic and military life. Twice since the Court's establishment we have given it new life when it seemed about to expire, by recognizing its authority and presenting causes for its adjudication. Our own army is now at its minimum—60,000 men, or three-fourths of one soldier for every one thousand inhabitants—a proportion which, if adopted by other powers, would speedily eliminate wars and rumors of wars from the daily thoughts of the chancelleries of the world." "This country will continue," he said, "to advocate and carry into effect as far as practicable, the principle of the arbitration of such questions as may not be settled through diplomatic negotiations. We have done much in this direction and hope to do much more." "We are even now negotiating treaties of arbitration with such of the European powers as desire them and we propose to invite the nations to a second Hague Conference, to continue the good work of peace. It has not been considered advisable to take any action in regard to the present Eastern conflict, but we can earnestly pray that the return of peace may not be long delayed."

Following Secretary Hay, brief addresses were made by Speaker Jones of the Massachusetts Senate, Mayor Collins of Boston, the Bishop of Hereford, England, and Herr John Lund, ex-President of the Norwegian Parliament. The Bishop of Hereford in the course of his remarks, said:

"We are all looking to the United States to take the lead in this matter of arbitration and disarmament. Our fate is fixed on the international policy of the United States in the years to come. You have one of the greatest opportunities of history, and there is no other country which can compare for a moment in regard to the power which you have to help forward this great movement. Let us pray that, as the spirit of democracy grows in our human life, the governments will do what the people say they must do."

In our European diplomacy, as I follow it sometimes, I am inclined to say that the great nations of Europe seem to believe, as represented by their war-like governments, in an entirely wrong theory of life. Their theory of life seems to me to be what we might call the "menagerie theory." But Mr. Hay's theory of life is that human life is a brotherhood. So we must get rid of this idea of dominance, whether in religion or in national life, which must give way to a federation of brotherhood.

Herr Lund spoke of the power of the press for peace and of the influence of mothers, wives and sisters. "A new day is dawning," he said earnestly, "and sooner or later the army of peace will come triumphant, bringing victory to our banners."

Many messages from leading peace lovers throughout the world were received and read to the Congress. One of these was from Sir Thomas Barclay, of London, in which he said he confidently anticipated an arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the speakers, Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, advocated an alliance of the navies of neutral nations to compel the predatory powers to keep the peace. He said:

The ocean ferry ways are well defined: marked on all the charts; winter and summer routes are laid down from all our ports to the harbors of Eastern Europe. Why not neutralize these ferry ways? Why not enter upon treaties among the states that border upon the seas, defining neutral zones and uniting navies for the defence of commerce against all predatory nations? Outside these ferry ways might be a fighting zone, where the men who think that warfare is necessary to manhood could meet and sink each other's steel clad coffins to their hearts' content.

Herr George Arnhold, a banker of Dresden, characterized Emperor William as a friend of peace, who maintained a big army and navy simply to guarantee peace.

At some of the meetings the ladies took a prominent part. Mrs. Lucy Mead Ames, Mrs. May Wright Sewall, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, Miss Jane Addams (of Hull House, Chicago), Miss Sheriff Bain of New Zealand, Miss M. E. Dunnill of India, Dr. Yamei Kin of China, Mrs. W. P. Byles of England, Baroness Von Suttner of Germany, and others made brief addresses.

Rabbi Levy, of Pittsburg, spoke of the deep interest of the Hebrews in world peace. Baba Baharita, of India, spoke in behalf of the lamas of Tibet, "a very small people, that they should not be molested in their peaceful avocations on the roof of the world." Dr. M. Chirurg brought greetings from Russia. His people were strongly for peace.

Resolutions were presented and adopted that the Congress should appeal to the Emperors of Russia and Japan to terminate the present war, and that each of the powers signatory to the Hague Convention be requested to urge Russia and Japan to end the struggle. It was also decided that the resolution concerning friendly intervention by the powers be presented to President Roosevelt by a committee of the Peace Congress.

One of the most notable speeches of the Congress was that delivered by Hon. Oscar S. Straus, who discussed the Hague Tribunal and its work. He held that the most important work this and future Congresses could do would be to ascertain and develop the best method and plan of invoking the initiative, in the task of reconciling two antagonistic powers.

Joseph G. Alexander, of the International Law Association, England, said what is coming to pass in our days—the constitution and work of the Hague Tribunal—is really the fulfilment of ancient prophecy, 2,600 years ago. It is a great step forward, when we can spread this spirit of fraternity of mutual love and brotherliness between nations, then the Court of the Hague can get to work; and we shall see that peace will be organized permanently and surely.

Prof. Quidde, of Munich, branded as foolish, the rumors of any possible conflict between Germany and the United States. The two countries could never be driven to war. The Hague movement must be made a practical one. Then there will be a slow, gradual increase of ameliorating measures, a change toward United States as the next great step toward world peace.

The second day's session began with the work of permanent organization, election of committees, etc. Robert Treat Paine, Sr., of Boston, was elected Permanent President of the Congress, and Benj. F. Trueblood Secretary. Vice-Presidents were chosen, one for each nation represented. Two great public meetings were held, one in Tremont Temple, the other in Park Street Church. Among the speakers were Hon. Oscar S. Straus, Ex-Minister to Turkey; Gustave Hubbard, member of the French Chamber of Deputies; Prof. Quidde, of Munich; Rev. Francis E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, and many others. All the addresses were short and well received. Rev. Charles Wagner, of Paris, author of The Simple Life, was also invited to speak.

The Divine Law

Text—John 8: 5, "What sayest thou?"

HAVE you studied Constitutional Law? Without doubt it offers one of the most appetizing feasts ever spread in the banquet hall of the mental epicurean. It follows with unerring eye the ramifications of a government's internal organism, even as a medical student searches out the entangled pathways of the nerves and muscles and arteries of the human frame. It tells us where the brain is, where the heart is, and why the arm is sinewy and strong. It tells from whence comes the source which creates the law, and whence the power which executes the law.

Constitutional law is above all other kinds of law. The National Congress and the Legislatures of the States deal with conditions as they arise, and sometimes, in their haste to remedy an evil or to provide means for an urgent purpose, they enact a statute which proves to be unconstitutional. What do we mean by that? We mean that there are certain fundamental principles of government embodied in our Constitution which must not be transgressed. If a law is passed which violates one of those principles, there is no need to repeal it, because when it is found to be unconstitutional, it at once becomes void and inoperative. Thus, back of all legislation stands the Constitution, as the supreme test by which the acts of President and lawmakers are judged. It defines the rights of rulers and legislators and sets limits to their power and is the safeguard of national liberty.

In the kingdom of God we have also a supreme authority. The councils of the churches may formulate doctrines, make decrees and construct creeds and catechisms, but high over all, there is the will of the great King of kings. Christ is the Supreme Ruler of his kingdom and his Word is the test by which every dogma and practice must be judged. Let us consider some of the characteristics of this government.

Christ Supreme

First, it is an absolute monarchy. We have governments on earth that we describe as absolute monarchies, meaning that they have no constitution. We speak about the Russian government as an absolute monarchy, but it is not. There are thousands of things which the Russian Czar would like to do, which he cannot do. With his pistol or sword Nicholas might slay his own children, as Ivan "the Terrible," in maniacal rage killed his first-born son, and no power on earth could bring him to justice. But there are limits to the present Czar's power. His own subjects recognize the fact. The old Russian proverbs tell us there are many things the Czar cannot do. Among those proverbs are the following: "Even the Czar gets his shoes bespattered if he puts his foot in a puddle." "The Czar's crown cannot protect him from a headache." "The ox of the Czar can have only two horns." "Even the Czar's vinegar will not sweeten." "Put the Czar in the desert and he is a man and nothing more." "The Czar's edicts are good for nothing unless God's 'Amen' is written on them." By these quaint aphorisms, current in Russia, do the people show that they realize that, powerful as the Russian autocrat is, he is subject to human limitations like the most obscure peasant in his Empire. It is well known, too, by statesmen, that even as a ruler he is not so supreme as is thought. The nobles who surround him exercise a constraint upon him and his agents often thwart his will.

In an infinitely higher sense is Christ the absolute ruler in his kingdom. In his wisdom and power, he governs without check and his Word is the law and life of his people. "I am the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is and was and which is to come the Almighty." "That means," says Dr. Key, "Christ is all in all of creation, of history, of scripture, of salvation. He is all in all in the life of the believer and in the life of the Christian church and in the life of everything." He is in truth more than a President, more than a Doge of Venice, more than a king, more than a czar. He is an absolute monarch in the Christian world. He shares his throne with no one. He is King of kings. His word is the law, and the only true law. Christ again and again emphatically stated that by him and through him must all things be judged as right or wrong.

A significant illustration of Christ's originality and his freedom from current principles and prejudices, is given in the Gospels, and it may help us to understand his attitude if we study the story. One day, while Jesus was teaching in the Temple, surrounded by the people, the Scribes and Pharisees tried to entrap him. Right into the temple where Jesus was, they dragged a trembling, frightened, sobbing woman, who had been taken in adultery. Right through the crowds of listeners they pushed her. Then they cried out in stentorian tones, so that all could hear, "Master, what shall we do with her? Shall we stone her to death, as Moses commanded, or shall we let her go free?" Instead of Christ condemning or acquitting the poor creature, as they all supposed He must do, Christ, by his actions, as well as by the word of lip, condemned the men who were her accusers. What was the meaning of that judgment? We cannot for a moment suppose that a being so pure as Christ, thought lightly of so heinous a sin. It must have been loathsome and abhorrent to him, but we may learn a lesson from the way in which he treated the sinner and her accusers. A lesson all the more weighty because it comes from Him who is the embodied law of the kingdom of God.

No Unjust Discrimination

The divine law, in the first place, makes no discrimination between the masculine and the feminine sins. It does not come to man and smilingly say, "Husband, you have a right to be a libertine while your wife must tread the narrow path of virtue." It does not say, "Brother, here in the 'saloon of respectability' you can get drunk, but if your sister is found in that saloon she will be disgraced for life." It does not say that a man can tell vile stories and frequent the low race-tracks and be the companion of pugilistic thugs and dissolute characters, and still be respected, while a woman, having once done wrong, can never be allowed to enter again into the association of the good and the true and the respectable. But the divine law does say this, "Oh men, if the sin that this woman has committed is to be punished by stoning, every one of you who has committed the same sin deserves to be stoned also." A blasphemy from a man's lips, in the sight of God, is just as vile and culpable as a blasphemy from a woman's lips. The sins of Ananias and Ahab are as evil as the sins of Sapphira and Jezebel. And yet, from time immemorial, the world has always had two criminal courts, in which it has judged its moral delinquents. The one is the "Court of Mercy" for masculine offenders, the other is the "Court of No-Hope," in which lynx-eyed Judge Hardheart sits upon the bench, charging the jury of "No-Regrets," and sentencing woman defendant after woman defendant to a life imprisonment in the "Penitentiary of Despair."

Shameless Boasting

The rule is, one condemnation for masculine sins and another for feminine. We all know that the Pharisical ideas of old are common at the present time. Indeed, I go even further than this; I sometimes think that as far as the world is concerned, many people are prone to admire men if they are not too good, if they have an immoral besmirchment on their record. They are not glad when they say, "He is a square, true man," but they are happy when they can say, "He is a wild fellow, but mighty nice." It is on account of this tendency of the human race to judge man's sins differently from woman's sins, that we often find men in public places, boasting of their evil deeds, as though they were the signs of true manhood and nobility. A few weeks ago I was riding in a California railroad train, opposite two men. One was a famous Eastern contractor. What was my amazement to find that his conversation was divided into almost two equal parts. The one was to tell his companion the hard work he was doing by day, and the other was to tell how many times he got drunk by night, and how he could out-drink every one of his business associates, with whom he was accustomed to deal. Had any woman dared in a public car acknowledge such debaucheries, every man, woman and child sitting within sound of her voice would have looked upon her as a moral leper, to be shunned as much as the Eastern lepers, who with sticks and stones are driven forth from the habitations of man.

Mercy for the Penitent

The highest compliment which in chivalric times could be given about a father was, "His daughters were all virtuous and his sons were all brave." But why should not the sons be virtuous as well as the daughters? And yet man; oh, bitter man; oh, censorious and guilty man, thou art ready to condemn thy sister when thou art not ready to condemn thyself. Joseph Parker, in one of his great addresses, describes a brother minister who had driven an erring and yet repentant daughter away from his home. Joseph Parker pleaded and prayed with the angry father to take her back. "But she has disgraced my home," said he. "I cannot, I will not take her back." "But, man," said Joseph Parker, "in your younger days, have not you yourself also been guilty of sin?" "Yes," said the father, "but I am a man and she is a woman. The world judges man's sins differently from a woman's sins." "That is so," said Parker. "Man judges man's sins differently from woman's sins. But Christ judges both the sins the same. 'He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her.' And, parenthetically, you will not be merciful to your daughter's sins, if you will not be merciful with you." Joseph Parker gave divine authority for his warning. Woman condemned is man condemned. Woman forgiven is man forgiven. No more, no less. Oh, man, if you will not deal gently with an erring sister, God will never deal gently with you.

Another characteristic of the divine law is that it recognizes no distinction of rank or station. As the divine law makes no distinction between sexes, it makes no distinction between the sins of the upper and the lower social classes. It does not have one criminal code for the palace and another for the hut. It does not have one for the wealthy Wall Street financier, who manipulates the railroad stock and "waters" it, cheats thousands of small investors out of their all, and another for the groceryman who has false weights, never sends a full pound of coffee, or tea, or sugar to his customers when they pay for a full pound. It does not have one set of rules for the wife of the millionaire, who hides her diamonds and watches and jewelry in her dress to escape the scrutiny of the New York Custom House officials, which jewelry she is bringing to her American friends after an European trip, and another set of rules for the newsboy, who steals a loaf of bread out of the bakery wagon when the driver is away selling his goods at a kitchen door. In other words, in homespun, it condemns in broadcloth. Where it says, "Thou shalt not" to the plebeian, it also says, "Thou shalt not" to the aristocrat. What it denounces in the serf, it also denounces in the ruler, sitting upon the king's throne, or of the judge sitting upon the Chief Justice's bench of the Supreme Court, or the premier, governing in statecraft as Joseph did in Egypt, or as Bismarck did in Germany, or as Gladstone did in the British Parliament. And yet, to hear some people speak of it, one might suppose that God's law was very deaf to the rich man's sins and very alert to hear about the poor man's evil deeds.

What the Divine Law Condemns

Do you believe God discriminates between the sins of the social classes? If you do, let me by the score of my text disabuse your mind of that surmise. Cor. let us push our way through the multitudes crowded in the Temple and find out who compose that group. Who are those strong, fine-looking men standing in front of Christ? They have in their physical moments, the actions of successful men. They have the glance of their eyes, the searching power which speaks command. "Those men," wrote Dr. Strong, "were the scribes. They were the doctors of the law and the interpreters of the Scripture." These old men are the Pharisees. But when these men, the leaders of Jerusalem, were standing there condemning a poor outcast woman for her sins, Christ, in silence, was making figures upon the ground with his finger in which they might read their own condemnation.

What did Christ Write?

What Jesus Christ was writing upon the ground is not recorded; but though we may never know on earth those exact words, I have a good deal of sympathy with that evangelist, who said that Christ was writing the evil history of each Scribe and Pharisee while they were speaking against the sobbing culprit. No soon did the first Scribe begin to talk than Christ began to write, as though he had set down these words: "Lay off, you are not living with your wife. She has left you on account of your dissoluteness. She is now going back to her father's home. For what are you condemning this woman? For your own sin?" No soon did the lawyer look down on the ground and see what Jesus was writing than he turned and departed. When the next speaker, a Pharisee, began to talk, Christ began to write again. "Rich man, you have never committed the crime of which this woman was guilty. But you own the house in which she lives and carries on her vile traffic. The rent you get from that house is blood-money. Why are you speaking against your tenant? You are a partner with her in crime." When the Pharisee capitalist saw what Christ was writing and that all the people were laughing at him, he also departed. So Christ went through the list of different accusers. But whether Christ was writing the history of those accusers on the ground, or no, we care not. For one fact we do know. By his silence, as well as later by his spoken words, Christ was teaching the sweeping lesson that a rich man's sins, a prominent

THE LIFE AND SERVICE OF THE GREAT EDUCATOR AND DIVINE FITTINGLY COMMEMORATED

THURSDAY, September 29, 1904, was a memorable day for Union College, Schenectady, N. Y., and indeed for the entire college world of this continent, for it was the occasion of the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the accession of Eliphalet Nott, to the Presidency of Union College.

The College was founded shortly after the Revolutionary War, by the settlers of the Mohawk Valley. No one denomination was strong enough to start a college of its own, and so this institution was begun as a "union" enterprise, when everywhere else, denominationalism was the rule. It was the second college in New York State, and for years it held a commanding situation in the educational world. Next to the importance of its beginning, was the occasion when Dr. Nott was called to its presidency, in which position he served for sixty-two years, leaving under him as pupils the grandchildren of his earlier scholars, and being revered by them all; for until the end of his life, which reached to the nineties, he was a man of personal power. Our eastern colleges were all begun by men of faith, and were maintained with great sacrifice. Their endowments consisted not of money, as in these modern days, nor in equipment, but in the nobler qualities of manhood. Dr. Nott was the man who moulded Union, and, through it, influenced many other colleges. From his rooms, men went out into positions of prominence in Church and State. In classroom they excelled as teachers, and at foreign courts they were proficient as diplomats.

Last year, it was decided to celebrate the hundredth anniversary, and as the day drew near, the interest became more keen. Collectors exhibited such trophies of the earlier days as they were able to gather. In one place was exhibited the roster of the college in 1819. The list of professors includes men who became noted in the college world, and some who acquired national and international fame.

Thursday morning was stormy, but the college campus was filled with people who had come to celebrate. At half-past ten, a procession was formed of the present student body, the various faculties of the university, and the invited guests, a long, imposing array, in cap and gown and hood. The procession entered the Nott Memorial Library, where the formal exercises were to be held. After prayer by the venerable Dr. Silliman of Cohoes, who had been a pupil and friend of Dr. Nott, the Rev. Dr. Raymond, the president of the college, unveiled a memorial tablet of bronze, with this inscription:

This building stands as a memorial of
ELIPHALET NOTT,

President of Union College from 1804 to 1866, one of America's greatest educators—a man of genius, of persuasive eloquence, and of rare personal power. Through the efforts of his grandson, Eliphalet Nott Potter, President of Union College from 1871 to 1884, this lasting memorial became possible. The final adaptation of this building to the purpose of a library is due to the generous gift of Andrew Carnegie.

The audience was then permitted to hear personal recollections of "Dr. Nott the man," from the lips of the Hon. Frederick W. Seward, LL.D., the son of Secretary Seward of Lincoln's cabinet. Mr. Seward knew him as an old man, when he (the speaker) was a boy, and was privileged to sit at his table during his college course. It was interesting to learn how Dr. Nott would lift up the conversation of that table from the small talk that is so common, to discussion of the topics of the day, so that the meals were a part of one's training.

Mr. Seward was followed by Bishop

Potter, a grandson of Dr. Nott, who spoke of "Dr. Nott the Preacher." The Hon. Judson S. Landon, LL.D., ex-Judge of the Supreme Court, analyzed the methods and powers of "Dr. Nott the Educator."

From the Round Building, the assembly adjourned to the State Armory, where a collation was served by the ladies of the churches of Schenectady. Over 800 sat down to dinner, at the close of which a number of the patriarchs present told of their personal recollections of Dr. Nott. One of the features of the banquet was when Moses Viney, a negro, was given an ovation. Moses ran away from slavery in 1840. Dr. Nott took an interest in him. The "fugitive slave law" was passed, and he was compelled to flee to Canada. Then Dr. Nott bought him from his Virginian owner, immediately making him free. Moses became a slave from affection from that time on. He served Dr. Nott as long as he lived. At every commencement, he still acts as doorkeeper at the President's reception, and he knows every student of Union for sixty successive classes. That they revere him was shown by the ovation, and that he was present was a tribute to the character of the man whose sermon on the death of Hamilton ended duelling in America, and whose patriotism helped to free the slaves.

lawyer's or physician's, or statesman's sins, or a minister's sins, are just as severely condemned in the sight of God as the poor man's sins. The Divine law discriminates not between the sins of the upper and lower social classes, but between sin and righteousness. The black of the broadcloth is the same black sin which sometimes nests under the rough woollens of the laborer and the mechanic. Sin is sin wherever found. And sin, by the Christ law, is to be everywhere condemned.

But I find in the next place another trenchant lesson. The divine law does not accept zeal in bringing others to justice, as a ground for absolving the prosecutor of his own wrongdoing. The Scribes and Pharisees cannot atone for their sins by denouncing and condemning others. Though a man might prove every other man a living example of total depravity, and devote his life to the exposure and arraignment of criminals, he must make his own place at the bar and answer the indictment of his own iniquities. Instances have been known of a criminal, under human government, securing for himself immunity from punishment for his own crimes, by betraying his leader to the officers of the law, or even by himself executing sentence on that leader, but such men are despised for their perfidy, even by the community that profits by the treachery. A similar principle is applied in our courts of justice when a man is allowed to turn State's evidence. It sometimes happens that there is no way of convicting a notorious criminal but by the testimony of a confederate. That confederate's evidence has to be purchased, and the price paid is a pardon for him of his own share in the crime. It is a heavy price to pay—a miscarriage of justice—but it is a result of the inadequacy of human administration, and it has no place under the vine law.

But what did Christ do? Did he say, "Pharisee, thou art a libertine; Scribe, thou art morally corrupt." Oh, no. He turned, and simply held up before their countenances, the mirror of convicting conscience, in which they could see their own sinful selves. Christ said: "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." Then one by one they slunk away. So my friends, when you and I to-day going forth into a sinful world, are trying to prove this woman is bad, and that man is bad, and that young boy is bad, and that young girl is bad, we are not deceiving God as to our own characters. We do not improve our standing at his bar by denouncing others. Rather by our harsh and uncharitable judgment, we are proving ourselves deserving of condemnation. Let us refrain from casting stones at the sinner. We must all answer for our own deeds at His bar, who said: "He that is without sin, let him first cast a stone at her." And without one exception, we must all either slink away, before the flashing eye of Christ, or, like the poor publican in the Temple, moan, "God, be merciful to me a sinner!"

The divine law is omniscient. Evil deeds that the world does not know of, are known to God, and at his judgment bar the evidence of them will confront the wrongdoer, if they have not been pardoned through Christ. Even in this world, crimes, long ago committed and successfully hidden, have been disclosed and brought home to the perpetrator. Oh, my friends, be not among the Scribes and Pharisees, who have no mercy no charity for sinners. Have our lives been immaculate? Is there any evidence against us that may confront us when we are mercilessly assailing our erring brother or sister? It will be a shameful, a humiliating position to stand convicted before Christ of those sins? Do you not feel that Jesus is speaking to us, as he spake to the prosecutors of old—"He that is without sin, let him first cast a stone at her."

But though the divine law was and is so hard upon the unrepentant sinner, how gentle, how loving, how pardoning, how forgiving it was and is to the repentant sinner who comes asking for mercy at the feet of Jesus Christ—sweeter than even the coming of a little child to be caressed and forgiven by a loving mother, is this picture in my text of a poor convicted outcast, trembling at the feet of Christ and finding pardon and peace and life. I see her shudder as they fling her at the Master's feet. There at first she shrinks under his pure gaze, expecting that one so sinless will endorse the condemnation of her accusers and, in horror at her crime, hand her over to the executioner. But though he loathes her sin he has compassion for the repentant sinner. I see her now, when all fear leaves her and the bad men turn their backs upon her. Now she looks up into Christ's face with grateful love. Oh, my friends, though you may be scarred with the sins of an evil past, though you may be cast out by the world as one who ought to die, mercy and pardon in Christ you will find. Will you not as a repentant sinner, throw yourself at his feet, where you will find peace and life and hope?

NELSON

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the marquis is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the marquis in confinement; and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness. By a clever ruse, Macartney compels Garron to let him take the marquis and Louise with him, in one of the ship's boats, while Garron is a prisoner in his cabin, disarmed and guarded by Brébœuf, who has now returned to de Vaudémont's service. Macartney lands his party at Alexandria, and the marquis meets Bonaparte, while the Irish captain sails off to seek Nelson and the British fleet. The marquis discloses Garron's plot to Napoleon, and the latter sets out with a party to rescue Brébœuf.

"H A, Junot!" called Bonaparte, "What is it?"

"Captain Gerard's troop will be here at once, sir," said Captain Junot, saluting.

"Have a horse saddled for mademoiselle."

"My maid is in the anteroom yonder," said Louise, "she will go too."

"Another for the maid," ordered Bonaparte. "Is that all?"

"That is all, sir."

"You will need to change your shoes for riding boots, monsieur," continued Bonaparte, as the officers filed out of the room, leaving them alone. "Perhaps you will honor me by—" He put out an exceedingly small and aristocratic looking foot of which he was justly proud, "I think my own will fit you."

He struck a bell as he spoke, and directed the attendant who answered it, to provide the marquis with boots and gloves.

"Your courtesy overwhelms me," said the old man. His hand went into his bosom. From it he brought forth his snuff-box. He hesitated a moment, opened it, looked quizzically at Bonaparte, who stood smiling before him.

"I never thought to offer courtesies to a Republican, but, general—will you honor me?"

"Tis my honor, monsieur," returned the little officer, bowing, and taking a generous pinch.

CHAPTER XXVIII

RIDING FOR BRÉBŒUF

PREPARATIONS for the ride were soon made. The old marquis was booted and gloved, and Bonaparte even procured a riding skirt for Louise. Before they started out, the general insisted that the marquis and his party should partake of some refreshments, to enable them the better to sustain the fatigues of their journey.

"A soldier," said the little man, "and a sailor, too, should eat whenever and wherever he can. We have a hard ride before us."

It was well that they complied with his advice for neither the one nor the other had ever participated in such a desperate gallop.

"Time," said Bonaparte at starting, "is the most valuable thing in life. The treasures of the world are nothing to it. Therefore we will ride fast. If the pace be too swift for you, monsieur, mademoiselle, drop behind, and half the troop shall escort you."

"The faster the better," said the marquis; "there is nothing so valuable to me as my servant's life."

"To horse then!" ordered Bonaparte, swinging himself into the saddle.

Next to him, upon his left side, was the marquis. Immediately in the rear came Louise and her brother, with Aurore close behind her mistress. Surrounding them, La Salle, Junot, Beauharnais, and the other officers of the staff. Then, to the rear of all, were the troopers with videttes thrown out on either side. The road ran along the shore. The state of the tide left the sand upon the beach uncovered. The going was absolutely perfect. They started off at a fast trot which, so soon as they passed outside the limits of the walls of the town, was increased to a gallop.

The general rode in silence. No one spoke, save now and then a whispered word from Honoré to his sister. The moonlight turned the sand into silver, and frosted the wavelets of the sea, but they had neither time nor opportunity to mark it as their bodies rose and fell in the sweeping stride of the horses; galloping to save Brébœuf.

The dawn was graying the desert when they drew rein at the landing at Aboukir. Boats from the ships were already making their way to the shore. Bonaparte flung himself from his saddle, walked out on the temporary landing-stage, hailed the first boat that came near, handed the marquis, Louise with Aurore, and the young comte with Beauharnais and La Salle into the first one, followed himself, and directing the rest of the staff to come in the next boat, ordered the men to row direct to the flagship.

Arrived there, the general boarded L'Orient, bidding the others wait in the cutter. As soon as he stood upon the deck he called the astonished officer, and directed him to awaken Admiral Bruëys, and say to him that General Bonaparte was there, and wanted to see him immediately.

In a few moments the little general, whose patience was of the shortest, was ushered into the admiral's cabin. Presently he came on deck, followed by the admiral. As they crossed the quarter-deck to the gangway, Bonaparte cast a look toward Le Tonnant, lying close to L'Orient, being, in fact, the next astern of the vice-admiral in the long line. Her crew was already stirring about on the decks.

"Shall I call my barge?" asked the admiral.

"No. I have a boat here. 'Twill save time. Look! What are they doing at the yard yonder?"

The general pointed, and then nimbly dropped down the battens to the cutter, where Bruëys followed him.

"What is that?" continued Bonaparte.

"They are rigging a whip on the yard-arm," said Bruëys.

"For what purpose?" asked Bonaparte, watching the other vessel.

"Possibly for an execution, sir," answered Bruëys.

"We shall be too late!" cried Louise, clasping her hands, for she instantly divined what was about to happen.

"Give me leave, general," said Bruëys. "Give way, men! Hard! The life of a brave man is at stake! A gold piece for each of you if we reach La Tonnant in time!"

The still water in the bay curled about the bows of the cutter. The stout ash oars bent under the vigorous play of the brawny sailors, as Bruëys urged them to greater and greater speed.

"This," said Bonaparte, as they approached nearer the vessel, "is the Marquis de Vaudémont."

"I served under him once," smiled Admiral Bruëys.

"Would that you were under me still," said the old marquis indomitably.

"I serve the Republic now," answered the Republican sailor imperturbably.

"See!" cried Louise.

A man's head appeared above the rail of the ship. He was being dragged up to a grating which had been fixed there. His hands were bound. Two men stood beside him, and hauled him up. The leaping sun shot over the eastern wastes, and the light of the morning fell upon the man's face. It was Brébœuf. They were close aboard Le Tonnant now.

"Faster! Faster!" cried Bonaparte.

"Shall we be in time?" asked the marquis.

"We must!"

"I will hail the deck if necessary," said Bruëys.

"No, wait," said Bonaparte, looking up. "The noose is not adjusted yet. He will be given time to pray."

The cutter was right under the bows of the ship now. In another thirty seconds she swung in toward the gangway. Before she had fairly come to a rest Bonaparte sprang up the battens like a boy. Bruëys motioned the old marquis, and he, as if the terrible fatigues and anxieties of the night were as nothing, nimbly followed the general. Then came the Republican vice-admiral, Louise and her brother, Aurore and the rest.

The hours that Garron had spent alone in his cabin with the silent Brébœuf were the most frightful in his history. The Breton would have shot him, or better have choked him to death as being least likely to attract attention, had not his master directed him to spare the man's life. For what purpose, Brébœuf did not divine. It was enough that he had been told to do a certain thing. He was one of those ancient men who obeyed absolutely, blindly.

At first, Garron thought to bribe him. He besought him, offered him every inducement which his brain could suggest. Money without stint. The storeroom in his cabin was filled with plunder. He had not been on the top wave of the Revolution since it began, without amassing a vast treasure, which, with the covetousness and caution of the French peasant, he had carefully preserved.

Old Brébœuf was deaf to every entreaty. He did not even deign to answer the man. He sat there, his pistol held carelessly in his hand, his eyes apparently closed, looking as indifferent as if he had been alone. Once Garron thought to take advantage of this seeming carelessness. The instant he made a threatening move he found himself covered with the weapon. No tiger ever watched its prey with more apparent carelessness, and with more real ferocity, than Brébœuf guarded Garron.

The silence of the old sailor grated on the nerves of the man. He broke down completely at last, and sobbed, and cried, and pleaded, as if he had been a child. If he could only be freed from the terrible espionnage of that relentless Breton! For a moment even! Of course Bonaparte must be in possession of that paper by this time; but all was not hopeless. He could send his men to the yards in the dark and make sail. He could cut cable and make a run for it. Le Tonnant was one of the fastest ships in the navy, one of the finest in the fleet. With the start that he might get in the night he had a fair chance of escaping. Bruëys could not weaken his force by detaching a squadron to go after him.

Out yonder, in the blue Mediterranean, were Nelson and the English. Salvation, reward! Here was nothing but this terrible old man. He studied the sailor's face until every crease upon the craggy and weather-beaten countenance was imprinted upon his mind. He strove to recall what he could of the man's characteristics. He appealed to him in every possible way. He could do nothing, nothing!

The dawn, that came stealing through the cabin windows, found him crouching before the rigid figure of the old sailor, a miserable, broken wreck. During the long, slow hours, he had died a thousand deaths. The entrance of his executive officer, who came in for the morning orders, awakened him at last.

"My God, at last!" he cried, his agony extorting from him even that acknowledgment of a power Divine. "Have that man seized at once! He is a traitor! He has betrayed me! I have passed such a night of agony—" The man's nerves gave way again. He buried his face in his hands, and cried like a baby.

"Your weapon, Brébœuf," said Captain Thouars, approaching him.

Brébœuf could have killed him, and then himself, but he had no orders. He had been told to guard Garron until morning, and then wait. He waited. He handed his pistol to Dupetit Thouars without a word. As soon as he was disarmed, Garron staggered to his feet, and struck him again and again in the face until he was cut and bleeding.

"Stop! Stop!" cried Thouars, shocked beyond measure, finally dragging Garron away by main force. "Are you mad?"

"If you had sat here with that iron hell-hound the night long, as I have, you would be mad, too."

"What has he done?"

"He forced me to permit the English prisoner, the marquis, the women, all my prisoners, to escape last night. They overpowered me in this cabin. They held their weapons against my heart, and forced me to give the order to enable them to get off. They have gone. It was this fiend that did it, and he shall pay for it!"

"Is this true?" asked Thouars, turning to Brébœuf. Like everybody on the ship, he would not take Garron's statement under oath. Brébœuf nodded. "You shall die! You shall die!" shouted Garron. "But after a court-martial?" suggested Thouars. "Am I the captain of this ship, or are you?" asked Garron. "He shall be hung at once, sir."

He struck the bell upon the table sharply. An instant after, a marine appeared.

"Summon the guard," ordered Garron. "Tell the officer of the watch to rig a whip on the fore yard-arm, and be quick about it!"

Then, as the sea-soldiers filled the cabin, he directed them to seize and bind Brébœuf. To these preparations the Breton made no resistance whatever. His arms were bound behind him, and he was roughly hauled from the cabin to the deck. Thither he was followed by the crazed Garron, Thouars vainly protesting.

It was full morning now. Garron glanced across the water. He stared anxiously at the sea and the shore. There was no evidence that any message had arrived from Alexandria concerning him yet. Perhaps Bonaparte had not returned, perhaps the marquis had not been able to see him. He might still have a few hours of respite. That dash to sea would be infinitely more hazardous in open daylight than at night. Still it would be his only chance. He would try it. But, first, he would hang this man. The animosity which he had cherished toward the family of the marquis was now centered upon Brébœuf.

The preparations were simple, and were speedily made. Garron did not even go through the formality of calling all hands. By his directions, two of the sailors were ordered to drag Brébœuf to the grating which had been rigged on the rail. A noose had been cast on the end of the whip, depending from the starboard fore yard-arm. It was passed around Brébœuf's neck. Garron himself gave instructions for the watch to tail on to the fall, which had been led through a snatch-block on the deck.

There was murmuring and rebellion among the crew. But they were unarmed, the marines were drawn up upon the quarter-deck, their pieces loaded. There was no doubt that they would fire if Garron gave the order. Proverbial hatred between sailors and marines was as strong in France as in any other navy. Besides, no one cared especially for Brébœuf. He had been in constant attendance upon Garron and had not made any friends among the crew. Indeed, the unpopularity of the captain was in a measure shared by his servant.

Every man holding the fall of the tackle knew that there had been no court-martial, that the law would not sanction this summary execution, but it was none of their affair. Under the circumstances, they had nothing to do but obey orders. Another moment would have seen the Breton run up to the yard-arm. Just as Garron was about to give the signal, Brébœuf broke the silence.

"A priest!" he cried.

"There are no priests in the Republic!" said Garron, brutally.

"A prayer!" entreated the Breton.

"Pray yourself, curse you!" said the captain. "Pick up that rope!" he shouted to the men. They had heard Brébœuf's appeal, and had instinctively relaxed their hold upon it.

"Give him time for a word, Captain Garron," said Dupetit Thouars.

"Not another second! Seize the fall! Set taut!"

The words "sway away!" trembled on his lips, as the reluctant men took up the slack of the rope, when, through the crowd at the gangway, there burst a small, but tremendous figure.

CHAPTER XXIX

"ALAS, FOR THE KING!"

"STOP!" he cried in a voice of authority which could not be mistaken.

"Bonaparte!" gasped Garron, blanching with terror.

"Release that man!" cried the little general. "Instantly!" He stamped his foot upon the deck. "Unbind him! How dare you!"

The men before him fairly shrank back and made room for him. They recognized him at once. Bonaparte turned to Garron. The sailor was twice as big as the general. Bonaparte seized him by the shoulder, and shook him as if he had been a rat.

"You dog!" he cried. "You infamous traitor! You would sell the Republic to the English!"

By this time others from the boat had come aboard. The officers on deck crowded aft. As soon as he was released, Brébœuf fell at the feet of the marquis. The old man lifted him up.

"Not there," he said, "but here!" opening his arms and embracing him.

As he released him, the eyes of the Breton fell upon Comte Honoré. With a glad cry, he ran toward the young man, who greeted him in the same way. Even Louise gave him both her hands, and smiled as he kissed them.

"Saved!" gasped the old sailor.

"Yes, thanks to you, my good Brébœuf," said Louise. "And to General Bonaparte," said Comte Honoré.

"Garron," said Bonaparte, having conferred a few moments with Brueys. "That paper?"

"It's a lie, it's a lie!" screamed Garron.

"I swear to you that I heard him bargain for it," said the marquis.

"And I, too," said Louise.

Bonaparte looked at Brébœuf. The Breton nodded his head.

"Citizens, this man offered to sell you to the English!" said Bonaparte, turning to the officers and raising his voice so that the whole crew might hear. By this time every officer and man on the ship was on deck. Forgetful of discipline, which was indeed laxly

Immediately his words were taken up by the crew of seven hundred men, which made up the complement of the ship.

"Hang him!"

"Up with the traitor!"

"To the yard-arm with him!"

Such a roar of passion was blasted up from the decks of Le Tonnant as seemed to rive the heavens. Garron threw himself upon the deck. He groveled before the stern figure of the little general. He clasped the general's feet in his hands.

"I confess it! For God's sake, let me live! Don't hang me! Protect me, mademoiselle, you are a woman! Speak for me!"

"No one shall speak for you," said Bonaparte. "No one shall save you from the doom you have brought upon yourself."

"Hang him!"

"The whip, the whip!" came from the crowd.

"To the grating with him!"

The ship was the scene of a terrible confusion.

"Back!" cried Bonaparte sternly. "We will not hang him," he cried, in spite of the ominous growl of rage and hatred that burst from the crowd. "He shall be shot here and now! On his own quarter-deck! Marines, there! Advance! Are your pieces loaded?"

"Yes, general," said the lieutenant in command.

"Captain Thouars, have that carrion taken to the poop-deck."

Shrieking, protesting, struggling vainly, Garron was seized and dragged to the poop-deck.

"Now, my lieutenant," said Bonaparte, turning to the marine officer, "take eight of your men up there. Shoot him!"

In an instant the marines appointed had scampered up the ladder. They seemed to relish their duty. They ranged themselves on the starboard side of the poop, while Garron was dragged to the opposite side. He fell in a helpless huddle to the deck.

"To your knees!" ordered Bonaparte sternly. "Or I will have you bayoneted to death where you are!"

Garron realized that all was hopeless. Some of the courage which had deserted him came back. He raised himself on one knee, resting one hand upon the deck, and glared at Bonaparte.

The general stood with a handkerchief lifted in the air. The eyes of the marine officer were fastened upon him.

"When I drop this handkerchief, monsieur," he said, "you will give the order to fire."

Garron presented a terrible picture. Flakes of foam lay upon his bloodless lips. His maddened eyes gleamed with hate and rage. He lifted his arm suddenly, and moved as if to spring to a standing position. What was in his mind no one knew. Perhaps he meant to leap over the rail and strike Bonaparte where he stood. The general was too quick for him.

"Curse the Republic!" shouted Garron.

"Fire!" cried Bonaparte himself, dropping the handkerchief.

The eight muskets crashed as one. The body of Garron half rose in the air, lunged forward, and then lay still. They could see a ghastly red blood-stain widening on the white deck as the smoke blew away.

"Justice is done! So perish all traitors to the Republic!" said Bonaparte quietly.

"Vive la République!" came in a tremendous roar from the crew.

"Now," said Bonaparte, looking around suddenly. "What is the meaning of this disorder? Get back to your stations, men! Do you hear? Is this the discipline you allow in your fleet, Admiral Brueys!"

"Sir," stammered the astonished admiral, "the circumstances—"

"Under no circumstances," stormed the little general, "should discipline be relaxed."

He made a step toward the men in the gangway. They fell back before him.

"Captain Thouars," said Bonaparte, "attend me to the cabin. Marquis, admiral," he added pointing aft, himself leading the way.

"Admiral Brueys," he said, when they reached the cabin under the poop. "You will make out an order transferring the command of Le Tonnant to Captain Dupetit Thouars. Marquis de Vaudémont—"

He did not finish the sentence, for as he turned, the old marquis slowly sank to the floor, collapsed.

"Look to the old officer," cried Bonaparte, as with a faint scream Louise sprang to the side of her grandfather. The ship's doctor who was present, bent over him. "It is only a faint," he said, despatching one of the officers for restoratives.

"Give way, men! Hard!" said Brueys.

"The life of a brave man is at stake."

administered, they came crowding aft, and some of the more venturesome even stepped on the quarter-deck. A yell of rage and execration followed the general's words.

"Mercy!" cried Garron, sinking to his knees.

"That's not all," continued Bonaparte, "You knew that a plot against my life was in existence six weeks ago. Why didn't you declare it?"

"I only found it out last night. I sent the paper to you immediately."

"Another falsehood," said the marquis. "My baggage was searched when I was captured."

"I made the search, general," said Dupetit Thouars. "I found the papers there. I gave them to Captain Garron."

"He knew it himself!" shouted Garron, white with fear and passion.

"It is not true," answered the marquis and Thouars at once.

"I was there," said the marquis, "this man," pointing to Thouars, "knew nothing of the contents of the papers."

"Enough!" said Bonaparte brusquely. "What punishment shall be meted out to him, comrades?"

"Hang him at the yard-arm!" shouted one of the officers instantly.

Greeting to the Peace Congress

THE following message of greeting from the readers of this journal has been sent to the International Peace Congress:

BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK, October 5, 1904.

HON. EDWIN D. MEAD, Chairman Peace Congress, Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass.:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers throughout this Continent, send cordial greetings to the Peace Congress, and to the noble men and women who have come from distant lands to join with our own peace lovers in sounding the call for international arbitration and amity. They earnestly hope and pray that the Congress may enjoy Divine guidance in all its deliberations, that its speakers may be given words of wisdom, and that its entire influence may be an effective aid toward the realization of the world's hope—the abolition of war.

Great reforms grow slowly, but it is surely cause for rejoicing that in many lands the people are awakening to the sin and folly of war, and to the conviction that no principle can ever be vindicated by violence.

May God soon send upon the earth abiding Peace!

THE EDITORS OF THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Workers Needed

GLOOMY indeed are the conditions and prospects of religious life, if the experience of one prominent pastor is typical. He was pastor of an influential church in New York, and saw much of the religious and social life of the city. In leaving it for another sphere of labor, he uttered words of warning to his brother ministers who remain, which ought to awaken serious thought and effort. He expressed the conviction, based on a careful canvass of the immediate neighborhood of his church, that there was an alarming declension in spiritual life and work. Church members, once active workers, had lapsed in large numbers. There were, he said, so many ex-elders, ex-deacons and ex-Sunday School workers in that one section, that if they were assembled they would fill a large church. Still more serious is his opinion of those who still maintain their connection with the church. They neglect their duties and cannot be induced to do work, which is clearly incumbent upon them. As an illustration of this latter class, he mentioned a sad incident. It was that of a lady in the church, who was requested to call on a girl, whose dress and conduct indicated a tendency to drift away from the paths of virtue and religion, though she was a member of the church. The pastor thought that a little timely talk and earnest warning, from one of her own sex, might avert her fall. The pastor was assured that the call should be made, but after a month had elapsed, the promise was unfulfilled. The lady had been too busy. He applied to another lady, who was an active worker, but she, too, failed to keep the promise that she readily gave, as did another to whom he appealed. When finally, after a long lapse of time, he obtained the services of a paid deaconess, the opportunity had passed, and it was then too late to save the girl.

These charges constitute a shocking indictment. Can it be true that there are so many officers and members of churches who have withdrawn from service? Is it possible that when an opportunity occurs of doing a service for Christ and saving a soul from falling, no one can be found to perform the duty? We do not believe that religion is generally at so low an ebb. The pastor's experience must have been exceptional. There are many churches in which there is activity and earnest endeavor to win souls. Nevertheless, the fact that such charges can be made, and that, too, by a man who has had abundant opportunities for observing the situation, should cause sincere concern. If such conditions prevail in any section, or in any denomination, a searching inquiry should be made as to the cause. The old Gospel has not lost its power. Is it being faithfully preached? Are the methods of keeping alive the spirit of Christ in the soul, which have been effectual in the past, still being kept up? Are the officers of our churches allowing the question of church revenues to absorb the attention which should be given to the spiritual condition of the members? Have our church services become too mechanical? In any way have we lost touch with Christ, who promised to be with his people always? These and other questions which will readily suggest themselves, ought to be answered. It is a time for self-examination and for earnest prayer that God will revive his work among us, that the curse uttered on Laodicea does not fall upon us.

The Ideal Sabbath

OUR symposium on Sabbath Observance, which appears in this issue, besides being one of the most helpful and interesting of the series thus far, has the distinction of being unique in the unanimity with which the writers condemn the prevalent and increasing tendency to the desecration of the Lord's Day. Among the many contributors there is not a single apologist for Sabbath-breaking.

It is apparent to all who are observant of the social and religious drift of the times that the "Europeanization" of the American Sabbath is becoming more pronounced, especially in our large cities. To many people the Lord's Day, instead of being a season of physical and spiritual reinvigoration, is little else than a weekly social round-up, devoted to feasting, pleasure-seeking, excursions, to the reading of light literature, or to music which, by a severe stretch of the imagination, is sometimes termed sacred, though more properly, operatic. "Company dinners," entailing needless domestic drudgery, and the occupation of servants to a greater extent even than on week days, are the rule in a very large proportion of city homes.

To call a day thus given over to appetite and worldly amusement the "Lord's Day," is a pitiful misnomer. It has nothing in common with the Christian Sabbath. The ideal Sabbath is a day of bodily rest and spiritual activities; of praise and prayer and thanksgiving; a day of the renewing of our covenant with the Heavenly Father and of the refreshing of our souls at the Gospel fountain in God's temple. Everything that invades the day and interferes with its appropriate duties should be firmly put aside. Self-denial should be exercised in our household affairs, which should be so arranged that no work that can be done beforehand should be left for the Sabbath day. It should be the Lord's Day in the kitchen as well as in the parlor; for servant as well as for employer. Every member of the household should have an opportunity to hear the preached Word. There is nothing sweeter than to see the familiar faces—parents and children—in the family pew. But if for unavoidable causes this is impracticable, then a simple home service, with reading from the Scriptures, praise and prayer, should be substituted. Thus the day should be spent simply and restfully, undisturbed by worldly matters, unvexed by business cares, and marked by clean thoughts and uplifting conversation. Sunday School, good books at home and cheery talk, with good music, will make the day pleasant for the children, who should be taught, both by example and precept, the real joys of the Lord's Day, which will influence the whole week. Let us tell them of the rich blessing that attends those who love and honor the holy day, and who so enjoy its gracious privileges that they can say with the Psalmist, "A day in thy courts is better than a thousand."

Modern Troglodytes

NEW YORK, having towered as far skyward as possible with its altitudinous buildings, is now turning its attention to the practicability of building underground. It is even said that the recently completed Subway is but the beginning of a big subterranean metropolis, and that, in the not far distant future, a considerable section of the population of New York will become like the Troglodytes or Subterraneans mentioned by Strabo and other ancient writers, as dwelling in natural caverns or in holes which they had dug in the soil of Mauritania, Ethiopia, and Egypt. These Troglodytes were primitive creatures, very much given to noise and screeching, the scientists assure us, and to other habits and customs also, that were not quite in accord with modern ideas.

That New York really means to attempt the experiment of an underground business section would appear from the fact that a project is now under consideration to build an arcade from the Twenty-third Street Station to Broadway and Fifth Avenue. Optimistic prognosticators say that not only will this arcade be built, but that there will be in time a subterranean city, with brilliantly lighted sidewalks, gay with shops of all kinds, music-halls and restaurants.

It may be that the problem of city congestion will be ultimately solved in this way. It has already been demonstrated that a fine store can be made underground, as there is one already built at the Twenty-third Street Station as complete as any in the surface shopping district; but we have yet to hear that there are any plans for the erection of subterranean dwellings, though possibly these may come later. But the underground city of stores, if realized, will in itself afford amazing possibilities. A dweller uptown could dive underground near her home, do her shopping in the subterranean stores, and not emerge again until she had finished. A business man could disappear like a jack-rabbit at one part of the city and reappear at another. This would be as near an approach to the Troglodytes as would be altogether agreeable.

On the whole, we don't envy the prospect of a Troglodyte reversion. We had rather live above ground, and enjoy God's beautiful sunlight and the strengthening air and the perfume of the flowers and the singing of birds. Rather than become subterranean and dwell in the artificially relieved gloom of the underworld, we would give our allegiance to the fabled Hypoboreans, who lived for a thousand years, under a cloudless sky in the enjoyment of perpetual spring, and whose fields yielded double harvests.

Let us live content, where God and nature have placed us, on the world's surface, and amid the enjoyment of its beauties and its blessings. We would not miss the sunlight, the blue skies and the beauty of wood, and mountain, and river for all the pleasures of an artificial existence in the centre of the earth. But, after all, it matters little where one's lot in life is cast; for trusting in the Heavenly Father, we can rest secure in the knowledge that we cannot drift beyond the love and care with which He surrounds all his children.

God's Comforting Touch

FATHER, heartbroken over the loss of a darling child of eight, asks if we may believe that our loved and lost are ministering spirits to us as we toil on the desolate way? There is nothing in the Bible to forbid the thought that our dear ones come back and help us bear our grief, and there are some reasons for the hope that they may do this. They are forever freed from the limitations of the flesh. They are forever freed from death. Moses and Elias talked with our Saviour on the Mount of Transfiguration. Why may we not think, as we sit by our lonely hearth, our invisible loved ones sometimes come and comfort us? But God's comfort is in the Master's assurance, "In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you, for I go to prepare a place for you."

The Archbishop's Visit

MOST cordial and respectful is the welcome accorded everywhere he goes in this country, to the Archbishop of Canterbury. Dr. Davidson is the first Primate of the Church of England to visit the United States, and his coming at this time is an event thoroughly appreciated by clergy and laity alike. In New York, the congregation that assembled to hear his sermon crowded Old Trinity Church to the doors, and those who were unable to gain admission would have filled the venerable edifice over again. The Archbishop spoke of the deep impression already made on his mind by his observation of American life; of the tremendous energy and restless struggle of the people, and of the signs of the vast wealth that accrued. It was characteristic of the man, so famous in his own country for his kindness and sympathy with the poor and afflicted, that he went on to say:

How easily in all the tossing of these rapids must the weaker sort of folk be submerged and go out of sight and out of thought. That possibility is of course not peculiar to this bright and busy land. But it is here so obvious as to make it to a visitor a recurrent thought. Back, then, to the touchstone of the life and words and principles of Jesus Christ. What did he come to the world to assert or to do? Hear him tell. "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost." He cares for, and wants us to care for and look after those whom in the hurry of strong healthy life we may be apt to neglect or overlook. We cannot too often be reminded how fundamental a thing it is in Christ's view—how he reiterated and dwelt upon it as a principle of quite universal application, not an accretion or an incident, but the very taproot of the whole. When he told men about the characteristics of what he called the kingdom of heaven, the new society He was founding upon earth, the new bond of loyalty to the living Lord, the new link of brotherhood with one another which He was fashioning, He laid special stress upon one absolute and constant thought—caring for the weak and the poorest.

There was no reproach in these words. The Archbishop had been through the tenement district of the city under the guidance of Mr. Jacob Riis, and had seen the efforts being made to help those who are in need. But it is significant that this high dignitary, in addressing an American audience should have uttered this kindly reminder.

They would that we should remember the poor: which very thing I was zealous to do (Gal. 2:10 R. V.)

Naturalized Citizens

The duty of this country to protect its naturalized citizens has been frequently called in question by other Governments. The subject was under discussion at a public meeting in Washington, when a member of the Diplomatic Service, who has served in Turkey, called attention to a practice which has been a source of embarrassment to our Government. It was that of a foreigner who is in bad odor with his own Government, coming here and staying long enough to be naturalized, and then going back to his native land to plot against his sovereign under the protection of his American citizenship. The diplomat, quoting the decision of an authority on International law, said: "The moment a foreigner becomes naturalized, his allegiance to his native Government becomes severed forever. He experiences a new political birth. A broad and impassable line separates himself from his native country." He added, that many persons had abused this doctrine by becoming naturalized American citizens with a view to returning to the country of their birth and fomenting discord, while claiming the protection of the land of their adoption. He believed our State Department would eventually be convinced that naturalization effected in the United States without any intent to permanently reside therein, but with a view to reside in another country, especially when such other country was the country of origin, should be treated by this country as fraudulent, and as imposing no obligation to protect such persons. Happily this principle does not apply to those who have abjured their allegiance to the Prince of this world. They are encouraged to go into the country of origin, that they may persuade others to follow their example in becoming citizens of Christ's Kingdom.

I send thee to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (Acts 26:18).

Russia's New Ruler

No man in Russia has greater power over its people than the man who holds the office of Minister of the Interior. The character of even the Emperor himself, is not a matter of greater concern to the vast population than is that of this powerful statesman. A large discretion is in his hands, and the welfare of more than a hundred million persons largely depends on how he exercises it. It is, therefore, a matter for thankfulness, that Prince Sviatopolk-Mirski, who has been appointed to this responsible office, is reported to be a man of broad sympathies, conscientious, and liberal-minded. It is as yet too early to know whether this estimate of his character is correct, but the fact that he is so described is welcome. He is of Polish origin, and has held several important offices under the Russian Government. He was at one time a subordinate in the department of which he is now the head; he has also been assistant chief of the gendarmerie, and later Governor-General of Vilna. It is a feature in his favor that he was disliked by his predecessor in his present office, M. de Plehve, whose harsh and cruel rule was ended by his assassination. M. de Plehve was continually quarreling with him when they were both in the Department of the Interior, and finally got rid of him by securing his appointment to Vilna. The new minister avows himself a friend of progress, and declares his intention to govern in a true and broad, liberal spirit. For the sake of the Russian people, who need precisely a ruler of that kind, we earnestly hope that his promise will be kept, and that his subordinates may be compelled to adapt themselves to those principles. It would be well if he made the advice of the ancient prophet the motto of his administration.

To undo the heavy burdens, to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke (Isa. 58:6).

Iron in Life-Preservers

An extraordinary charge is made against a firm of cork manufacturers by a New York house, whose business it is to supply life-preservers to steamships. The New York firm sent an order to the cork-manufacturers, for blocks of compressed cork for several thousand life-preservers. Eight blocks of cork are needed for each life-preserver, and the United States law requires that the aggregate weight of the eight shall not be less than six pounds. When, however, the order was executed, it was found that eight blocks weighed only five and-a-half pounds. Complaint was made, and in order to comply with the law, a number of heavy blocks were sent, one of which was to be used with seven of the blocks of the first consignment. It was found that by doing so, the seven blocks of the old and one block of the new aggregated six pounds, as required by law. But it was noticed that the heavy blocks were no larger than the light ones. The mystery was explained when one of the heavy blocks was broken open. Inside, was a piece of iron weighing half a pound. If the facts are as alleged, the imposition is heartless and cruel in the extreme. A person in a steamboat disaster putting on a life-preserver constructed of cork so weighted, would really be carrying half a pound of metal instead of the half-pound of cork which he needs to buoy him up. Happily, the substitution was discovered in time, so no mischief was done in that instance. There is reason to fear that many souls seeking salvation are similarly impeded by teachers to whom they go for advice, who lay penances upon them instead of guiding them to Christ. There were such men in our Lord's time.

They bind heavy burdens and grievous to be borne and lay them on men's shoulders (Matl. 23:4).

Unrecognized Wealth

A singular incident of a transaction which has proved the foundation of an enormous fortune is related of a millionaire in the West. Five years ago he was a merchant in Nebraska. Among the accounts owing to him was one that had been standing so long that it was outlawed. But the debtor was an honest man, and the merchant believed he would pay if he ever had the means. He, therefore, went to see him. The debtor said that he had always intended to pay, but had never been able. He had no money then, but he offered his creditor a number of shares in a mine. "They are not worth a cent on the dollar," he frankly explained, "but some day they may become valuable, in any case I will give them to you, as I have nothing else." The merchant accepted them, and laid them aside and forgot them, until one day three years afterwards he noticed in a newspaper the name of the mine, and the statement that gold had been found there. The price of the shares had mounted by leaps and bounds. He examined the shares in his possession and found that they were worth $75,000 in the market. His astonishment may be imagined, for he had regarded them as worthless. The day is coming when such surprises will be general. Some who are accounted rich will find themselves poor in heavenly riches, and some who were despised for their poverty will find themselves heirs of a kingdom.

I know thy works, and tribulations, and poverty (but thou art rich) (Rev. 2:9).

BRIEF NOTES

China still has 1,400 cities, with an aggregate population of over 100,000,000 without missionaries. It is further estimated that she has over 1,000,000 unevangelized villages.

John D. Rockefeller has given the Cleveland Young Women's Christian Association $50,000 in addition to a like sum previously given, if the Association completes a fund of $150,000 by November 1.

Dr. T. J. Barnardo has issued his annual report of his work among street waifs of London, and other large English cities. From the figures given, it appears that there are now in his homes 7,500 children, ranging in age from infants to boys of sixteen. Besides these, he has already sent 15,785 to Canada.

Young Men Seeing the Invisible

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

If one of the angels who protected Elisha had to tell the story of the lesson, he would probably give some such account as this: "I belong to the invisible angelic host, which encamp round about them that love God, to deliver them. Men pray, 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil,' and God answers the prayer by giving us charge over them. It was given to us to touch the eyes of Benhadad's soldiers, and in that touch was blindness for a season. Then they accepted as a guide the very man they were seeking to kill. Elisha brought the Syrians to Samaria, the very stronghold of Israel, and into the presence of Jehoram. Then our touch was required again, and their sight was restored. They recognized then that they had been trapped, and they expected nothing short of destruction. Indeed, King Jehoram was impatient to execute vengeance upon them. But Elisha forbade this, and instead, commanded that food should be given them, and that they should then be allowed to go back to their own country."

Illustration and Application

How a king and a young man learned the might of invisible forces is the central truth of this story—a most pertinent lesson for all, but especially for boys and young men.

1. How a King Learned to Reckon with Invisible Forces. It is not true that victory in war always goes with the strongest battalions, unless by that is meant the invisible forces that gave victory to Deborah, when "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera;" and to David, when he kept step with "the sound of a going of horses' hoofs in the tops of the mulberry trees," and to Hezekiah, when the vast army of Sennacherib "melted like snow at the glance of the Lord;" and to Protestant England, when the Spanish Armada was approaching in seemingly resistless strength—"He blew with his wind and scattered them." The confidence that comes from being on God's side, has often made the few victors over the many. God is as manifest in the historic ages, as the power that makes for progress, as in the earlier geologic ages. Neither Waterloo nor wireless telegraphy can be reasonably explained without God. So, in this lesson, Benhadad found there were invisible forces defeating all his military plots for the conquest of Israel. He and his captains would carefully plan an ambush, but when his troops were hidden on the path that the king of Israel would naturally traverse, the latter would unaccountably take another course and escape.

At last Benhadad was compelled to suspect his most trusted officers, to whom he said: "Which of us is betraying my secret plans to the enemy?" "None," said one of his captains, "but the prophet Elisha learns them from the God of Israel, who knows every word you say." "Then we must capture him," said Benhadad, who is not the first or last ruler that has fought against God. Bad men thought to silence Jeremiah, Daniel, John the Baptist, Paul and other prophets, and in some cases they have silenced such voices, but they have not so defeated the plans of God. For a year at least, after he tried to capture Elisha, his soldiers knew better than to give battle again to those invisible forces that had blinded them at Dothan, and led them captive to Samaria, and then had magnanimously restored to them sight and liberty. Benhadad's case recalls the dying prayer of Tyndale, when the king of England was fighting against God in refusing to allow the Bible to be translated, and had doomed Tyndale to martyrdom for giving the Bible to the people: "Lord, open the King of England's eyes."

In the midst of a Presidential campaign, devoted largely to material discussions, let us not forget that invisible forces have had a large part in our own and other national histories. The venerable historian, Hon. George Bancroft, wrote in 1884, his conviction of the inseparableness of liberty and religion, as follows: "Certainly our great united commonwealth is the child of Christianity. It may, with equal truth be asserted that modern civilization sprang into life with our religion, and faith in its principles is the life-boat on which humanity has at divers times escaped the most threatening perils." Benjamin Franklin grew up in the deistic belief that secondary causes and general laws are sufficient to account for everything that happens, and that God plays no part in human history except as the author of those general laws. He had been confirmed in this way of regarding the process of affairs through scientific studies, which accustom a man to seeing intently and distinctly the facts which lie near his eyes, and disuse him from looking further. As our envoy to France he was well placed for studying the course of events in a calm and philosophic spirit, and in a human environment not of the devout kind. Yet Franklin declared that what he had seen of the Revolutionary war had satisfied him of the active participation of God in human history, and had shattered his deism to pieces. So John Adams wrote: "I always consider the settlement of America with reverence, as the opening of a grand scene and design of Providence for the illumination of the ignorant and the emancipation of the slavish part of mankind all over the earth." The Legislature of Pennsylvania in a like faith abolished slavery in that commonwealth as an act of thanksgiving to God for the successful outcome of the war of the Revolution.

2. How a Young Man Came to See the Invisible.—It is said, in explanation of Moses' wonderful renunciation of Egypt's glorious crown, in order that he might suffer with his own people for a true faith: "He endured as seeing Him who is invisible." But for that habit of including the invisible world in his reckoning, Moses, instead of being the foremost of purely human characters, the leading human figure in three great religions, and the law-giver of the world, might have been the mummy of that comparatively unknown Pharaoh that passed the customs in Egypt during its last war, marked "dried fish." And our lesson gives young men another instructive example of reckoning with the invisible. This young man, servant of Elisha, awakening one morning in Dothan, saw the Syrian army closing in on the town from every side, their swords flashing in the morning sun, and ran to Elisha in terror with the news. Elisha showed no alarm, for the vision of God casts out fear. The prayer he offered is the very prayer most needed in our homes and churches to-day: "Lord, open the young man's eyes."

DOTHAN, THE SCENE OF THE MIRACULOUS DELIVERANCE

When the writer, after sixteen years of almost constant travel about this country, is asked, "What is the most serious peril of our time?" he answers swiftly, "The fact that of our fifteen millions of young men between the ages of sixteen and thirty-eight years, only five per cent. are in our churches, while they are a majority in the prisons, and in those prison preparatory schools, the saloons and Sunday ball games." The church, where the writer preached just before writing this lesson, had in a few weeks lost half of its young men from the church services and Sunday School through the toleration of that city of illegal Sunday ball games. In very childhood we must teach our future men that are as real and more important than the visible; that the wall the boy sees is not more real than the invisible air between him and the wall; that the word he speaks is not more real than the thought that prompted it; that the world about him is not more real than the God who made it; that his body is but the house of the thinking, loving, willing soul that dwells in it and will some day leave it behind for another world as real as this, where we shall dwell with God and angels, who are even now evermore about us. Perhaps young men would be more interested in angels if shown by Bible references that angels are in the Bible represented always as stalwart young men, not winged girls.

We have telescopes, microscopes, spectroscopes, stethoscopes, but we need also a theoscope for seeing God, and here it is: "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God"—not in heaven only, but here and now. Let us correct that materialistic and erroneous teaching, that we "belong to the animal kingdom," by repeating again and again that impressive story of the aged Emperor William of Germany, grandfather of the present Emperor, who, visiting a school, lifted a fragment of stone and said, "To what kingdom does this belong?" "To the mineral kingdom," replied the school in concert. "And to what kingdom this flower?" "To the vegetable kingdom." Then the Emperor, wishing to illustrate the animal kingdom, laid his hand on his heart and said, "And to what kingdom do I belong?" All the children, wiser than their books, instinctively refused to classify the Emperor with animals. After a solemn pause, one child said softly, "To God's kingdom, sire." Aye, let our school-book makers take note of the correction—we belong not to the animal kingdom, which we touch on the lower side of our nature, as animals touch vegetables, and vegetables, mineral on their lower side. Everything should be classified by its higher faculties.

It was a strange mistake of a generation ago that was embodied in the hymn, "I want to be an angel," which has been cast aside, not alone because men have come to understand that redeemed men are above angels, but more because this generation thinks very little of the invisible world and is in no hurry to get there. This is partly a wholesome reaction from too much "otherworldliness" in religion, toward the idea of making a "better country" and a "better world" here and now; but still more is it due to the fact of a growing disbelief in hell and devils, which has carried with it doubt of heaven and angels also. The cure is in one supreme argument, namely, that it is the most reasonable thing any reasonable being can do to accept absolutely whatever is clearly taught by Jesus Christ, who is almost universally acknowledged to be the world's greatest Specialist on religion. We should use our imperfect reason only on the lesser things which that perfect Reasoner did not speak. That is

True Rationalism

We may say: I believe in angels because Jesus did. He always quoted the Old Testament as true and authoritative as one quotes unquestionable history and decisions of supreme court. And the New Testament was written by the very men whom he promised to "guide into all truth." For a young man to plan his life with the teachings of Christ ignored, is even more foolish than if he left out Copernicus and Newton and Stevenson and Fulton and Edison, and tried to get on without steam and electricity and the other fruits of science.

The young man of our story entered into a larger, nobler world when his opened eye enabled him to see that there are "more inhabitants of the air than of the solid ground." A lady, who had become much interested in the subject of guardian angels as connected with the passage, "He shall give his angels charge over thee," chanced to be riding with Mr. D. L. Moody on a train. She asked the question "Mr. Moody, what do you think about angels?" The quick reply was, "I think this car is full of them, guarding these Christians on their way to the Sunday School convention to which we are going." Let us have no peeping muttering spiritualism, which seemed to prove that disembodied spirits lose both their intelligence and morals, but let every man ennoble his life with the true spiritualism that recognizes that we belong to two worlds, and live on their borderland. The voice of our Heavenly Father is calling every young man to his highest function and privilege, a daily fellowship, not alone with angels, but with God himself, to love whom is the greatest gladdest act possible to any human soul. This may be illustrated by the following beautiful story:

During our Civil War news came to a lonely farmer that his only son had been severely wounded. The father, old and poor, started out to find him and bring him home. Much of the journey he made on foot, and when he reached a great camp no one knew of his son, and in his simplicity he could not definitely locate him. After vain inquiry in several camps he resolved to go from camp to camp, shouting, "John Thomas, your father wants you." At last one day he passed the tent where his son, just out of delirium, heard in his first conscious moments that cry: "John Thomas, your father wants you." He turned to his nurse and said: "And I want him. Tell him quick I am here." And so his father took his sick, pale boy home and restored him to strength. One day, shortly before he was to return to the army he told a Christian friend how his father had found him. "Have you thought," said the friend, "that this story has a heavenly meaning. 'John Thomas, your Heavenly Father wants you.' He cries with infinite yearning, 'My son give me thine heart.' And so John Thomas learned to say, 'Heavenly Father, thy son wants thee.' When thou saidst: 'Seek ye my face, my heart said, Thy face, Lord, will I seek.' This great truth that God is ever with us was most beautifully expressed by Rev. Francis Lyte, when failing health compelled him to resign his work with a beloved congregation in England, to go abroad for his health. Pale and weak and sad he bowed his head and prayed that he might write something that would speak for him, now that he could no longer preach. The hymn written after that prayer was:

Abide with me, fast falls the eventide.
The darkness deepens, Lord, with me abide;
When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, Lord, abide with me.

An Earnest Appeal to YOU

WE recently published an appeal to our subscribers to send us the names of 25 adult Protestant Church Members, and the response was both prompt and generous—resulting in Nearly Half a Million Names. We had, however, planned for greater things, and, in addition to the names we then had on hand, and those recently received, we need at least another Half Million to complete the number we first had in view, and therefore issue this New Appeal. We hope that all who have not yet responded will kindly favor us with a List.

Our aim is to largely increase our Subscription List, by sending out a Christian Herald Prospectus for 1905, to a Full Million of New People, and we are quite sure that all who may receive this beautifully illustrated Prospectus, will thank those who made it possible for us to send it to them. Our subscribers will, of course, receive their own copies of it as soon as issued. If you did not respond to the first call please respond to this. By so doing, you will help along The Christian Herald, and the good cause of pure and elevating literature. This is a Home Missionary Effort, and, apart from the beautiful Volume which we mail to all who send us a list, it will, like every good

Truth than now, and the Children of the King, if they will, can do most to help us. Those who have read The Christian Herald know that no other paper is so well adapted for the end in view, and we cannot but believe that Every Subscriber who reads this appeal, will be glad of the opportunity offered to cooperate with us in the good work contemplated.

Now the sending of 25 names is not a difficult undertaking; yet it will help along the great work in which we are engaged. Surely we may depend on you for this favor, and when you get the volume, you will agree with us that your labor was not in vain.

To enable all who have not already done so to aid us in our efforts, we deed, be, in itself, its own reward. Never before in the history of our country was there more urgent occasion for the wider spread of Gospel have extended the date of mailing the lists of new names to October 26th, by which time we hope to receive At Least Another Half a Million.

Free

Christmas Gifts Well Worth Having

Bogatzky's "Golden Treasury for the Children of God."

HERE is a book of which millions of copies have been sold, and which has been a spiritual comfort to millions of people. It has been translated into nearly all European languages, and no book outside of the Bible has been so largely circulated or so widely read.

This helpful volume contains 365 pages, or one for every day in the year, and each page contains a Scriptural text, a simple, spiritual exposition of the same, and a hymn of praise and encouragement. For daily use at family worship, as a treasured monitor, and as a source of strength and wisdom, the Golden Treasury will be found invaluable.

James Clarence Harvey's "Select Readings and Recitations."

THERE is no end of books of this kind, but—alas! how few there are that can honestly claim the distinction of being particularly choice.

Mr. Harvey, in this volume, has admirably succeeded in combining the patriotic, the thrilling, the humorous, the pathetic, and the poetic in such a masterly fashion that not a single selection will admit of even the slightest adverse criticism. It is the best compilation of its kind, culled from the most famous authors of all ages and all nationalities.

Old and young will find amusement and entertainment in this delightful volume, which does infinite credit to its talented compiler.

Either of these Superb volumes, beautifully Bound in White Vellum and Gilt—Making a Charming and Most Dainty Christmas Gift—will be sent Free to Any Subscriber sending us a List of Twenty-five Names (using the blank on the next page), and Ten Cents in stamps or coin to Cover Packing and Postage. One Hundred Years of Methodism

A REMARKABLE CELEBRATION HELD AT POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

ONE hundred years ago saw the first Methodist congregation organized in Poughkeepsie, N. Y. One year later, in 1805, the first church building for that denomination was erected on Jefferson Street.

TRINITY M. E. CHURCH,
POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.

Gregory was pastor, and Rev. Robert Knapp assistant pastor.

On September 25, 1904, a series of meetings began in commemoration of the centenary of Methodism in that city. The celebration will be continued from the above mentioned date until November 20th inclusive. It was suggested by the executive committee of the Trinity Brotherhood, or Mens' Guild, under whose auspices this celebration is held, that there be a union observance of the occasion under the direction of the presiding elder of the Poughkeepsie district. Not only the different Methodist churches of the city were asked to fittingly recognize the interesting event, but all the Methodist churches in the district were represented by delegates, and one of the bishops was invited to give an appropriate address.

The programme for this notable celebration contains many interesting features. The Sunday night sermons during this period were preached by the pastor, the Rev. Dr. John J. Reed. The services each Sunday night were devoted to the interests of different organizations, including the Mens' Guild, F. & A. M., Junior Order of U. A. M., I. O. O. F., Y. M. C. A., Dr. Barnum's Bible Class, and Knights of Pythias. The Firemen of the city were invited to the services on Sunday, November 6.

On the evening of Thursday, September 29, the Trinity Brotherhood, or Young Men's Guild, held a banquet, this being a preliminary feature of the celebration. Two hundred members and their guests were seated at the tables. The principal speakers were Senator C. P. McClelland, head of the United States Custom House service, and Rev. George Eckman, pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Church, New York City. Senator McClelland made a witty and telling speech. Subject, "If I Were in the Pulpit," which was ably responded to by Dr. Eckman, whose subject was, "If I Were in the Pew." Mayor Hine, who was introduced by Dr. Reed, was among the speakers of the occasion. Rev. A. P. Van Gieson, pastor of the First Reformed Dutch Church, spoke on, "Methodism and the Old Dutch." There were a number of pleasing addresses from others, and a fine musical programme.

The pastor of Trinity Church, Dr. J. J. Reed, read an original poem, and was frequently interrupted by applause as the author carried his listeners along, giving a fine word picture of the time when Methodism first made its advent in Poughkeepsie, up to the present.

On Apokeepsing's rugged shore,
Where Hudson proudly flows;
Whence savage hordes were driven back
By ploughman's toil and musket crack—
An humble hamlet grows.

On through the days of the trials which the early settlers bore with such courage, until they had built "court-house, city jail, yes, church and schoolhouse." Then came the man on horseback, in of garb and speech; he preaches in the open air, makes a convert, forms a class; the seed is sown, and by and by a church is built. This was one hundred years ago, and now, from the humble hamlet as sprung—

City of bridge and beauty great,
With elm and maple clad;
With College Hill and Var
Hall—
With public spirit spanning all
Thy citizens are glad.

Glad of thy growth in Church and State;
Glad of thy self-control;
Glad of thy arching trees of green,
Glad that thy city sits a queen
Where Hudson's waters roll.

Men of a guild who celebrate
At banquet board to-night,
The genesis of Trinity,
The Gospel that makes all men free—
We greet you with delight.

That Gospel let us all proclaim
By life and lip and limb,
Make vital ev'ry truth we know
And illustrate where'er we go
The thought—"I live for Him."

Dr. Reed's gavel, which he used for the first time on this occasion, has an interesting history. It is made entire of precious woods, brought from the Holy Land. These woods are joined together in a very ingenious manner. There is a bit of wood from the grape vine of Eschol; Terebinth from Shiloh; Oleander from Pella; Balm of Gilead from Jericho, and the handle of the gavel was taken from an almond tree. This pleasant occasion showed that there is no real alliance between religion and gloom.

REV. J. J. REED

A REST HOME FOR MISSIONARIES

VERY sympathetic and practically useful is the project of a missionary colony which has been launched near Goshen, Mass. Its object is to provide a home in which the missionary seeking rest and recuperation while on furlough, may stay during his visit to his native land, and where students who are preparing for work in heathen lands may meet him, and gain from him practical knowledge of service in the field.

The Medical Missionary Society has long desired such a resort, the benefits of which are obvious. Only too often the missionary returning after many years of service in India or China or Africa, finds that he has now no home in his native land. His parents have died in his absence, his relatives are scattered, and there is no roof offering him shelter and congenial companionship. The Society desired to establish a refuge to which a missionary so circumstanced might go, and there turn to useful account his period of rest, in preparing recruits for the field. The usual difficulty of lack of funds prevented the realization of this kindly project, but two years ago the first and most important means came into its hands. The Hon. Alvan Barrus donated for the purpose nearly forty acres of land, fourteen miles northwest from Northampton, Mass. The site was exceptionally suitable, being in a bracing, salubrious region, fifteen hundred feet above sea level. It has been appropriately named "Mountain Rest," and already three buildings have been erected on it.

A nine-roomed cottage of two stories was first completed, and this was named after the illustrious missionary, Adoniram Judson. The second erected was a two-story cottage of eight rooms, named Livingstone Cottage, after the famous African missionary. These cottages were finished, furnished and filled during the later summer months of 1902 by missionaries and others. The third and largest building erected was named "Scudder Hall," of which a photograph appears on this page. It is named after Dr. John Scudder, the first medical missionary to leave the United States for a heathen land. Scudder Hall, which is now practically completed, is intended for the residence of recruit missionaries, and will also provide for the boarding of the occupants of the cottages, or veteran missionaries; parlors and library for general use being also contained therein. The lower story provides for storage, culinary and laundry purposes, and contains a dining-room measuring thirty feet square. The second story has a dormitory, parlor, class room and library; while the third story affords dormitory provision for twenty or more, and the attic floor storage room and rooms for servants.

About one thousand dollars are needed to complete the furnishing of Scudder Hall. As funds are received for the purpose, other memorial cottages will be erected and named as donors may wish. All the stone required for building can be found on the site, and timber and labor are very cheap, so that cottages can be erected at small cost. Over two hundred dollars have been given towards a cottage to the memory of Dr. John G. Kerr, who died in Canton in 1902, after nearly fifty years of service.

The three buildings already put up represent three denominations: Judson Cottage, the Baptists; Livingstone Cottage, Presbyterian; and Scudder Hall, the Reformed (Dutch) Church. The Congregational body will no doubt soon have a cottage to the memory of one of its missionaries; and the Methodists have started a fund for a Baldwin and Thoburn Cottage, to the memory of the wife and sister of Bishop Thoburn, and of Stephen Livingstone Baldwin, who, after more than twenty years' service in China, as Secretary of the Methodist Foreign Missionary Board for many years.

An opportunity is thus afforded to perpetuate the memory of deceased missionaries, and to aid living ones to better service. Each denomination should have at least one cottage, and doubtless some will soon have more.

The cottages, to be erected as means are given, will be dotted around the spacious grounds, and in these cottages retreats the tired missionaries from "the far off" will find needed rest and quiet, with privacy and retirement. All guests be provided with board at Scudder Hall, and thus be saved from care and any chance incident to housekeeping.

Some cottages will be of one story, and contain a parlor, three bedrooms and a bathroom, for the exclusive use of the family. Others will comprise two stories and have a double bedroom and a parlor on each side of the lower floor; also a bathroom, with five single rooms above for use of missionary guests. The former will be built and furnished for $1,000; the latter for $1,500; larger ones for $2,000 or $2,500.

Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt, the secretary and director of the Medical Missionary Society, who has had many years of experience in caring for, and training of, missionaries, resides at Mountain Rest during the season, and is ready to aid all guests with medical counsel and advice, free of charge.

During the past summer over fifty missionaries have found rest there, and have heartily appreciated the privilege. They belonged to various denominations. As the society is undenominational, it has made no discrimination, but welcomes all, and thus makes the place a genuine missionary home.

THE "REST HOME" FOR MISSIONARIES AT GOSHEN, MASS.

Our Girls

"GIRLS," said Edith, musingly, "may be roughly divided into two classes, the pretty and the plain."

"I don't think," said Aunt Patsy, "that I can agree with you. There are so many pretty girls, and so very few who may be styled ugly. Why, every girl under twenty has some beauty, either of abundant hair, or fine complexion, or bright eyes, or winning grace of manner. I never yet have seen a girl who was not attractive while in the bloom of youth endured, unless," she added reflectively, "she were discontented or fretful. An air of discontent blights any girl's beauty. It is like frost on a flower, blackening and withering the blossom's perfection."

"You are eloquent, Aunt Patsy," laughed Edith, looking in the glass. She saw there a very lovely face, peach-tinted, with soft, brown eyes, and a beautiful brow and chin; a face that was as changeless as the summer sky.

"I'm glad that I'm pretty," she remarked, solemnly.

"Why, Edith!" Her mother's tone was most reproving. "You must not think yourself pretty, that spoils everything."

"I'm not so sure." Aunt Patsy smiled as she looked up from the white shawl she was knitting. "A girl is not blind, and she knows at a glance what sort of personage she is. Nobody can make a beautiful girl fancy herself the opposite. My idea is that vanity ruins comely looks, but that candor does not hurt them. And beauty is a fading flower. How many ordinary middle-aged women there are who, a few years ago, were quite as pretty as Edith?"

Edith went dancing away to take a music lesson, waving her hand as she went, to her aunt and her mother.

"She'll never lose her good looks while she is happy," said Aunt Patsy.

"Nor while she is well," added Edith's mother.

"Nor while she is interested in people and things outside of herself," said the grandmother, who had been till now a silent listener.

The three women were right. A girl who is thoroughly happy, whose heart is satisfied, who enjoys the day's work, and loses whatever she has to do, will not soon lose her beauty. She may slip along the pleasant grooves of the years from nineteen to thirty, and defy time to do anything that is important in her life. On the contrary, a girl who is dissatisfied with her surroundings, who is always wishing she were somewhere else, always complaining that she wants things she cannot get them, will aid time in defying her beauty.

Health, too, is a magician who wields a potent wand. If a girl is often ill, often laid aside by malaria, or colds, or indigestion, she will inevitably grow sallow, have a rough skin, and show the ill effects of disease. A man told me once that the young women of a certain place were all "as homely as hedge-fences" when eighteen, and when I inquired why, he said, "It's readily accounted for. They are never free from colds and that bleak spot."

Colds may be defied by those who live according to the laws of health, be the atmosphere what it will. A girl needs warm, loose clothing, not tight corsets and insufficient underclothing to preserve her vitality; she needs good food and enough of it, not sweets nor pickles, and an abundance of sleep in a well-ventilated room, if she would retain unbroken physical health. She should go out, whatever the weather, and take a long daily walk; she should guard against eating between meals, and colds will pass her by.

A girl who cares for others, for their joys and sorrows, for their little pursuits, will have an expression of sweet unselfishness that in itself will be winsome.

How often we see the growth of beauty in a girlish face. To begin with, the features may not have been regular or delicate, and the face may not have called for more than a passing attention. But the girl goes to a good school. She associates with refined and lovely companions. She has a beloved teacher, who is womanly and noble, and whose aims are high. Day by day our girl unconsciously imitates this teacher and these companions, and her beauty keeps pace with her mental and spiritual development. Beauty of soul endows her with rare beauty of person.

"You think then," I hear a girl inquire, "that anybody may become beautiful, even though not born so?"

Yes, I do. And there is a quality much more to be desired than mere beauty, and that is charm. A plain woman with charm, will surpass and throw into the shade a beautiful woman who lacks this crowning grace. Charm is very subtle. It is made up of several ingredients. The voice aids it, the inward repose augments it, and it is greatest in those who think least about having it. Simple goodness is apt to possess it in a high degree, and any one who loves the whole world will not miss this most adorable characteristic.

Bad women as well as good women have had charm, and as we read history we see that Jezebel must have had it in a high degree, as Lady Macbeth and Cleopatra and Mary Queen of Scots had. When charm enhances wickedness it is a wonder that angels do not weep. But these were exceptions. As a rule, charm goes with goodness, and it is usually safe to trust that sweet innocence which makes a young girl so precious and so dear to those who love her. In itself, that white innocence is girlhood's supreme charm.

The Saving of Money

A YOUNG man was showing his savings-bank book to a friend the other day. It showed a thousand dollars in five years from a small salary.

"My income is larger than yours, and I have saved not one cent," said the friend. "How have you done it? You are always well-dressed, you live comfortably, and yet you have money to the good, and I have none."

"For one thing," was the reply, "I do not smoke. None of my earnings go for cigars or tobacco. The habit of smoking, enjoyable as some of my friends find it, makes a leak in many an income. It is like a hole in the pocket, unsuspected, through which the small change drops. Small change foots up to dollars in very brief time indeed."

"I doubt whether I spend much on smoking," musingly answered the friend.

"Keep an account for a single month, and you will know. By the way, a poor man should keep accounts. The custom is a safeguard."

"Perish the thought, I don't want to know where every penny drifts."

"Well, I do."

They separated. A day or two later they met on a street corner, at twelve o'clock.

"Come and have luncheon with me," said the lavish friend. "One gets a very decent luncheon at the —, for very little money."

"If we hurry a bit," said the thrifty friend, "we can easily catch the train for home, and lunch there, and as this is a half-holiday, we may as well do that."

At the railway train, the youth who saved money purchased a single newspaper. His companion bought four, remarking that he liked to get as many points of view as he could. He soon exhausted his papers, and left one in the ferry-boat and two in the cars.

A day or two later, the young men again met. One was carrying a rather clumsy bundle.

"If that were mine, I'd send it by express," said the other.

"Yes; but it is not heavy only rather cumbersome, and I'd as well keep my quarter," was the conclusion of the fellow who knew how to save.

There is the danger that excessive economy may lead to stinginess and the miser's hoarding. Certain very wealthy men in America so cultivated frugality when they were poor and struggling that to save became a habit, and they grew close-fisted and mean as they grew old.

But the tiny leaks wear the hole in the dam. The young man who would get ahead in this great country of ours must exercise a rigid self-denial in his days of small things. After the first accumulation of even a little capital, the sum in hand will increase as a snow-ball by accretions. As a wholesome check on parsimony nothing exceeds the giving of the tenth of one's gains regularly to the Lord, who prospers one. If not the tenth, then a specified sum should be laid aside for Christian work and beneficence, and that money never used for other purposes.

Nobody wants to grow dwarfed and hide-bound like Old Scrooge, whom Dickens delineated with a master-hand in one of his famous Christmas stories. But there is no need of this. A wise economy provides for the future, and if there be conscientious stewardship along with the economy, no one need fear that he will degenerate into the most contemptible of characters—a miser.

Fascinating Qualities

"She possesses fascinating qualities," said one lady of another.

"What are they?"

"I cannot define them. Who can define perfume? Mrs. W. has charm, the charm of a manner that is not occupied with herself but is bent on making others feel at ease. She is not young, and she never was a beauty.

but she looks sweet and wholesome; she has a vigorous step, and takes a keen interest in life. She reads her Bible and the newspapers, and knows what is going on, and is fit company for the angels, for she is trying to go on God's errands. She is nice to old people and little children, and looks after those who are apt to be neglected.

"Then, too, she has kept up her music, and is always willing to sit down and play for any one who asks her. Yes, she is a woman full of fascination."

It seemed to the listener as if almost any one who tried might acquire that sort of fascination.

"'Twas her thinking of others made you think of her."

How the Pulpit can Aid the Pew

BY PASTOR THOMAS SPURGEON

It goes without saying that the function of the Pulpit is to aid, not to amuse, nor even to educate the Pew. The minister is to be to all his hearers what "Help" was to Christian. From every slough into which they may have fallen he is to draw them. Moreover, it is his to endeavor to prevent them from getting into the morass. A helpful ministry is a successful ministry. "You have helped me," is the best compliment a preacher can receive.

There is untold need of help. The sorrows, the struggles, the temptations of life are neither few nor slight. Life is not child's play, and religion is not a merry-go-round. The forces arrayed against the children of light and the truth of God are fierce and formidable. This race cannot be a walk-over for any competitor. We must so run as to obtain. To help men to run well is the preacher's task. He coaches and encourages the racer. May he not also be expected to play the part of pace-maker? The occupant of the pulpit of a church with many members needs to be a many-sided and a large-hearted man. It has been well said, "If a minister has as many eyes as Argus to watch, as many heads as Typhoeus to dispose, and as many hands as Briareus to labor, he might find employment enough for them all." Happy the members who rejoice in an all-round ministry.

In order to be of real assistance to the occupants of the pew, it is essential that the grand old Gospel be faithfully proclaimed. It must never slip the minister's memory that those who hear him are dead in trespasses and in sins, that if they have not believed, they are condemned already, and that "neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." Our heart's desire and prayer to God is that they may be saved. This is first and last. Believing that sin is a malady for which

There is But One Remedy

We must continue to declare that there is no cure for the wounds of a bleeding world save the blood of Christ. "Sir, we would see Jesus," met my eyes the other day as I ascended the pulpit in a strange place. I was glad of the reminder, although I had already selected a theme that was "All About Jesus." C. H. Spurgeon used to say that when he ceased to proclaim salvation through the blood of the Lamb, and preached any other gospel than that which declares Christ to be the Substitute for sinful men, his people would be at liberty to hasten him from the pulpit to an asylum, for in that case they might be certain that he was bereft of his reason. How shall we help the pew?—why, by preaching unto it Jesus, Jesus, always Jesus, for None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.

To faithfully expound to the people the Word of God is a right good way to help them. To the law, and to the testimony. We have not nearly enough expository preaching. Though there is nothing like it for the feeding of the soul, the Immortal Book is neglected. With some, other volumes take its place, as if, forsooth, anything could be a satisfactory substitute, and as if they had already used the Bible up. Somewhere I saw an advertisement which ran thus: "Is your Bible worn out?" I fancy that a bookbinder was looking for business; but it occurred to me to ask the question of some of those who are forsaking the fountain of living waters for the broken cisterns of human literature, "Is your Bible worn out?" Have you exhausted this gold mine? Have you not rather discovered that it is as the countryman said, "No end of a book." Does it not suit all needs? Is it not, as Gregory the Great affirmed, "A stream where alike the elephant may swim, and the lamb may wade." New flowers are constantly being discovered or cultivated, but for two thousand years, corn, in some shape or form, has remained the staple food of all the nations. The Book of books is

The Staff of Spiritual Life

In order to help the pew, let us take to it the Word of God, believing in its inspiration, and ourselves feeding on its truths and promises. Then the people will be fed with the finest of the wheat. They will soon learn to prize God's granary, and will be found crying with hungry hearts, "Lord, evermore give us this bread." Every place of worship should be a house of bread, and every preacher should be another Joseph handing out the life-preserving grain. This is the true help. All else, in comparison, is unworthy of the name.

I am disposed to mention, next, the necessity there is for speaking pointedly and personally. Personal dealing is possible in the pulpit as well as out of it. Searching the heart and touching the conscience is needful work. The best fruit is handpicked, and it is quite a mistake to suppose that from the pulpit one can only shake the tree. To use another metaphor, if we are obliged to pull the bow at a venture, we believe that God directs the shaft. We should always pull in that confidence. "He's far too personal," was the complaint of one whose veneer had been cracked, and whose varnish had been blistered by a straight talk; but the criticism was, on that very account, a real compliment. Of course, the personal preacher must not expect to be popular, unless, perhaps, he is an evangelist, here to-day and gone to-morrow. From such, men profess to like straight hitting. But it is a very different thing to "sit under" so self-revealing a ministry. Many look upon their minister as an individual who is paid to do a certain work, as any other professional man might be, or, for that matter, as the tradesman is. They put out their religion to be done by him, just as they give their washing to the laundry-woman, and they are willing enough to pay the account involved, along with the butcher's and the baker's bills. But, seeing that they pay for their spiritual pabulum just as they pay for the meat that perisheth, they must have it, also, according to their choice. Consequently, some sermons are made to order, and might well be ticketed, "Fashionable," "Latest Novelty," "Favorite" and the like. Alas for the day when the preacher's lips move at the dictation of the people's wills. It devolves imperatively on

REV. THOMAS SPURGEON
Pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London

The Preacher to be Personal

"Too personal!" Our hearers do not thus complain of their physician. They are quite prepared to furnish him with symptoms, to undergo examination, and to take prescriptions. How is it that he is never blamed for being "far too personal?" Because health is a distinctly personal matter. Would that the people recognized the soul's health as a personal matter, too, as it most certainly is. Every preacher, then, should resemble the Roman galleys, which were fitted with boarding-bridges by which the boats of the enemy were grappled and held. Daniel Webster, being asked, "What is the most important thought you ever entertained?" made reply, "The most important thought I ever had was my individual responsibility to God." In order to awaken in the hearts of men such considerations, the pulpit must personally and pointedly address itself to the pew. It goes without saying, that the help that many worshippers want, is solace and succor. To put a little rosiness into someone's sunset is a good work. To pour oil and wine into another's wounds, is to do God's service. The world is weary and the way is rough. The poor, the weak the aged, the heart-broken are ever with us. "Comfort ye my people, saith your God."

For the sake of God above us,
For the sake of those who love us,
Each and all should do their best
To make music for the rest.

It should be the aim of every occupant of the pulpit to minister grace to his hearers. How may he best minister the grace of patience, and hope, and courage? He must speak from experience. He will not then belittle the struggle, or underestimate the strain. He must speak with

Sympathetic Heart and Tone

Chiding and scolding he will put far from him. He will be as a nurse with her children. The very patience of the Lamb of God will be exhibited by him. He will point the sufferers to Christ and say, "The best Friend to have is Jesus." He will tell them that in all their afflictions He was afflicted, and that having been tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin, He is able to succor them that are tempted. He will bid them cast their anxiety on Him, for He careth for them. He will persuade them no longer to remain as ships in the offing, driven with every wind, drifting on every current, the prey of every storm. He will urge them to enter the harbor of refuge, where God's "strong consolations" provide sure anchorage. He will not really help the pew if he points to any friend save Jesus, to any system of philosophy instead of Gospel, or if he calls in any comforter except the cleat. The mirage becomes a pool when the G all comfort is diligently sought unto.

It may be wise at times for the pulpit to c error, and to tackle difficulties. As a rule, the way is to oust error by declaring the truth. Th rigines of New Zealand have a quaint song, in they mourn the advent of the "Pakeha," or white and predict that he will eventually possess their nd.

As the Pakeha fly has driven out the Maori fly,
As the Pakeha grass has killed the Maori grass,
As the Pakeha rat has slain the Maori rat,
As the Pakeha fern has starved the Maori fern,
So will the Pakeha destroy the Maori.

Yes, surely enough, the old order changeth, and well in the case we are dealing with that it does. light will dissipate the darkness, and the truth o the inventions of men. "Preach the Word" is th motto to inscribe in a minister's study and pulpit. better is it if it be engraven on his heart.

Whereas difficulties are not to be shirked; care ust be taken not to create them.

Doubts Fly Fast Enough;

we need not give them wings. The good seed n hand to scatter it or a bird to bear it, but the tle down of error flies on the wings of the wind. is for the pulpit to speak definitely—dogmatically, will. "If any man speaketh, speaking as it wer racles of God." The pulpit is not Coward's Cas, some decide, simply because the right of inquir and the reply is denied the audience; but it deserves th when he who occupies it fears to declare the counsel of God, or avoids handling themes whic are as momentous as they are mysterious. Never! mere polemics are not to be desired. "But foolis unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do e strifes."

These, as it seems to me, are the main matters T abide by the Gospel, of which the atoning sacrific Christ is the all-glorious centre; to expound the ratures, with the sure conviction that they are ad message; to address heart and conscience with all restness and love; to speak comfortably to the distr and with illumination to those who sit in the sha and all that God may be glorified—this is the duty of the preacher, and doing this conscient is and continuously, he will not fail to help the pew fullest and noblest sense.

Of course the serving of the meal is not to be ign Appetite may be whetted by the suitable garnish o the viands, the decoration of the table, and the c ing of the joint. For my own part, I am sufficientl fashioned to advocate not only the division of th course into heads, but the practice of indicating e landmarks at the outset. So great a preacher a Dr. Alex Maclaren said, as he began a remarkable course: "The text suggests to me three question I mention them now, that we may understand era we are going." I am persuaded that such plans quated though some dub them, are useful. They eip our hearers to "get it all," to use a suggestive p ase that an American visitor to the Metropolitan Be nacle recently employed in my hearing.

Helpful Illustration

The praises of illustrating need not to be sung. I ry body likes pictures. Only they should be well-d not over-colored, nor too numerous. The recital an incident, especially if it embodies one's own exper ce may prove the salvation of a sermon, and, percl ce, of a hearer. Metaphors need not prevent a disc being "masterly," and even an anecdote, if it b true, and is skilfully told, does not stamp a serm as childish. If we really want to be helpful w ust stoop to sluggish intellects, and poorly informed n and simple tastes. There ought to be something in sermon for everybody, and if it is, for the most sh broken small, it will suit the majority without seri inconveniencing the learned minority. The Lord had plenty of "likes" in his addresses. "The kin om of heaven is like . . ." was his constant saying. The pulpit of to-day should make its exhortations afte the pattern provided by the Prince of Preachers.

It is helpful, I fancy, to the listeners if, as the mon ends, there is a summing up of what has gon fore, and an earnest application of the burden c theme as the last refrain. Not that the applicatio be left to the last. It has already been suggeste at the whole address should be pointed and persona steady look into the faces of the people, a po question, a pause as if for reply, an earnest ent are never out of place, and it is often wise to intro them where they are least expected—but the ambador's last word must be specially urgent. "Now en, we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God di be sech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be reconciled to God. For he hath made him to b sin for us, who knew no sin, that we might be mad to righteousness of God in him. We then, as worke together with him, beseech you also that you receiv the grace of God in vain." The men who preach i spirit of this quotation cannot but be helpers o faith and joy, and of those who hear them.

THE LATE SENATOR HOAR

EVERY section of the country sympathizes with Massachusetts in the loss of her honored statesman, Senator George Frisbie Hoar. Men of all political parties, and men who were counted his political foes, have tendered tributes of sorrow and esteem, and have borne witness to his singularly pure and upright character and his conscientious attitude on all public questions. He was a quiet, dignified, high-principled man, scrupulously just and courteous to opponents. His profound learning and his oratorical abilities insured him the closest and most respectful attention whenever he rose to speak in the Senate, and his services in the Committee room were invaluable to his colleagues.

Mr. Hoar was seventy-eight years of age. He was born at Concord, Mass., and graduated from Harvard at the age of twenty. The extent of his ambition, at that time, as he has himself told us, was to be a country lawyer, busy with drawing up deeds in his office and conducting cases in the courts, thereby earning enough money for a plain, unostentatious life, with a surplus large enough to gratify his taste for rare books. But his friends and neighbors believed that he was fitted for a higher and broader life than that, and could serve his country in a more influential sphere. The result proves that they were right. In this era of aggressive, alert, hustling politicians, the calm, judicial mind which Senator Hoar brought to the consideration of national questions, was precisely the element most needed in Congressional life. At the age of twenty-six he was elected to the State House of Representatives, and became a State Senator in 1857. His conspicuous ability displayed there, after a few years led to his election to Congress. He took his seat in the lower House on March 4, 1869, and from that time to the day of his death gave his services and all his vigorous and well-trained powers to the interests of his beloved country.

In the House of Representatives Mr. Hoar's abilities were speedily recognized. He was made a member of the Committee of the Judiciary, which was a peculiarly congenial appointment for his keen, logical mind. His speeches commanded the attention of the House, and were noted as the most convincing arguments on his side of all questions. That he was an intense partisan no one could deny, but he was thoroughly sincere, and every one who heard him was sure that he believed every word he uttered. In 1877 he succeeded to the seat in the Senate of Mr. George S. Boutwell, and from that date until his death he continued to be a member of that body. He served on the Committee of the Judiciary, and was chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He also served on the Committee on Claims for a short period, but at the beginning of the Fifty-second Congress resigned to become Chairman of the Committee on Judiciary, which he remained to the end.

THE LATE SENATOR GEORGE F. HOAR

ported him. In private life as in Congress, Mr. Hoar was the plain, honest, sincere, conscientious Christian. His own life was modelled on the principles, which, in an eloquent speech delivered a few years ago at Concord, he formulated as those of an ideal clergyman. He said: "To reinforce the sense of duty; to strengthen the will; to kindle the flame of religious affection; to turn the thoughts to whatever is pure, honest, lovely and of good report; to make Sunday last through the week; to bring consolation to sorrow; to organize charity; to stimulate Christian activity; to summon youth to holy living and brave dying; to drive the clouds of spiritual darkness from the way of men and from the wayside; to bring the kingdom of God into this world; to bring life as well as immortality to light—these are the functions of the Christian priesthood."

GIVING REWARDED

ONE of the most remarkable psychological facts is, that there is no better remedy for depression of spirit than that of doing a service to some other person. The attempt to cheer some one, to lift a burden from some one's shoulders, to make some miserable person happy, is the surest of all methods for recovering our own cheerfulness. It may be that the recipient is not grateful, that we get not one word of thanks for what we do, but we never miss our reward. There is the promise, too, that God blesses the giver with prosperity, but that ought never to operate as a motive. It is with God to give, or to withhold, and we may be sure that he does not approve of giving as an investment. It is those who give out of purity of heart and with no expectation of reward, who receive bounty at his hand.

Our giving should never be the thoughtless dole to the clamorous petitioner. It is easy for a man with abundance of means to rid himself of a persistent beggar by handing him money, but that is not the spirit of true charity or generosity. It degrades the recipient, and it is a tax on the giver. The help that really helps, is to study the problem of the needy, to discover means by which the necessity for alms shall cease to exist, and the poor man shall be able to support himself by his own labor. Of course there are cases in which temporary help in money can alone avail. Cases of helplessness, of the sickness of the breadwinner and of sudden emergencies, but these are exceptional. It is the chronic beggar who usually thrives by beggary, and he least of all deserves to thrive.

To the cause of Christ in the world, giving is a duty that is sure to be blessed. When it is done unostentatiously, when it is done with a sincere desire to serve him and from love of him, the giver rejoices in the self-denial it involves and receives in his own soul the promised reward.

SAFEST FOOD

In Any Time of Trouble Is Grape-Nuts.

Food to rebuild the strength and that is predigested, must be selected when one is convalescent. At this time there is nothing so valuable as Grape-Nuts for the reason that this food is all nourishment and is also all digestible nourishment. A woman who used it says:

"Some time ago I was very ill with typhoid fever, so ill everyone thought I would die, even myself. It left me so weak I could not properly digest food of any kind and I also had much bowel trouble which left me a weak, helpless wreck.

"I needed nourishment as badly as anyone could, but none of the tonics helped me until I finally tried Grape-Nuts food morning and evening. This not only supplied food that I thought delicious as could be but it also made me perfectly well and strong again so I can do all my housework, sleep well, can eat anything without any trace of bowel trouble and for that reason alone Grape-Nuts food is worth its weight in gold." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Typhoid fever, like some other diseases, attacks the bowels, and frequently sets up bleeding and makes them for months incapable of digesting the starches and therefore predigested Grape-Nuts is invaluable for the well known reason that in Grape-Nuts all the starches have been transformed into grape sugar. This means that the first stage of digestion has been mechanically accomplished in Grape-Nuts food at the factories and therefore anyone, no matter how weak the stomach, can handle it and grow strong, for all the nourishment is still there.

There's a sound reason and 10 days trial proves.

peace, going on probably for many decades to come.

The outlook for peace in various countries was outlined in five-minute addresses by Prof. Houzeau de Lehaie for Belgium, Prof. Th. Ruysen for France, Dr. Adolph Richter for Germany, George Thomas Snape for England, E. T. Moneta for Italy, L'Abbe Pichot for Monaco, John Lund for Norway, John Olsen for Sweden, Richard Feldhaus for Switzerland, Jean Larissa Melikoff for Armenia, and Albert K. Smiley for the United States.

Just before the close of Thursday's session, a letter was read from Andrew Carnegie, in Scotland, suggesting as a plan for realizing universal peace, a union of the great powers—Britain, France, Germany, and the United States, to enforce a peaceful settlement of all disputes, and thus "at one fell swoop war would be banished from the earth." Mr. Carnegie proposed the appointment of a committee to consider the project. His letter was received very enthusiastically. At the same day's session, the reduction of armaments was considered, and resolutions were adopted expressing the conviction of the Congress that gradual disarmament should be the first subject to be discussed by the World's Peace Conference, suggested by President Roosevelt.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles spoke at one of the meetings, strongly favoring the reduction of great armies and navies, which were a constant menace to the world's peace. He believed wars could be abolished by the united action of the civilized nations. Great Britain and the United States have each spent millions in recent wars, which could have been used to much better advantage at home.

Some of the foreign delegates made very interesting and eloquent addresses. G. H. Perris, of England, said that the attempt to justify warfare was due to ignorance. Warfare had become a process of manslaughter by machinery, and had in its result neither justice nor the strengthening of the human soul.

Baroness Von Suttner, the next speaker, believed that as women were the educators of men, they should be taught the lesson of peace, and thus prevented from encouraging their sons to be great soldiers and patriots.

Pastor Charles Wagner urged the better and broader understanding of each other by nations as an essential step toward the world's peace.

Among the speakers toward the close of the first week, were Mr. E. D. Morel and Mr. George Herbert Head, both of England, who made brief addresses on the Congo question, Mr. Morel adversely criticizing the Belgian administration and Mr. Head defending it. Rev. W. H. Morrison, formerly a missionary on the Congo, also spoke on the subject.

Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead, for the Committee on Propaganda, reported a plan for the work, which was unanimously adopted. It recommends the raising of a fund equal to the price of a battle-ship, $4,000,000; and the establishment of centres of the peace propaganda.

The Late Postmaster-General

DEATH is no respecter of persons. It enters the Cabinet as unceremoniously as it does the laborer's cabin. An illustration of the fact is found in the lowered flags on the Post Offices through the land. The chief of that great system of communication lies dead in his Washington home. After a severe and protracted illness, on Oct. 4, Henry C. Payne breathed his last. The President called to see him shortly before his death and was again at his home a few minutes after his end. He was naturally deeply moved by the loss of this member of his official family. To a friend whom he met shortly afterwards, Mr. Roosevelt expressed his sorrow. "Mr. Payne," he said, "was the sweetest, most lovable and most trustful man I ever knew."

Mr. Payne was sixty-one years of age when he died. He was born in Massachusetts, but when a young man, removed to Wisconsin and settled in Milwaukee. He was poor at that time, and was glad to obtain employment as a salesman in a dry-goods house. His energy and tact soon won him promotion, and when he began to take an interest in politics, his services were appreciated and turned into public channels. In 1876 he was appointed Postmaster of Milwaukee, and by successive nominations held the office for ten years. He afterwards became interested in railways and telephones. As President of the Wisconsin Telephone Company and the Milwaukee City Railroad Company, he developed both enterprises, and brought them to a high state of efficiency. For two years he served as one of the receivers of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company.

When Mr. Chas. Emory Smith resigned the Postmaster-Generalship in 1901, the President invited Mr. Payne to succeed him. At the beginning of his administration he was confronted with evidence of graft among his subordinates. As Mr. Hay said of him, "He was a man of such remarkable uprightness, conscientiousness and purity of character that, judging other people by himself, he was slow to believe evil of any one." When the evidence proved irrefutable, he suffered a severe shock. He was amazed and horrified, and there is little doubt that the repugnant task of detecting and punishing the wrong-doers, intensified his disease and hastened his death.

THE LATE HENRY C. PAYNE

Aid for Macedonian Refugees

WRITING from Adrianople, Turkey, the Rev. G. D. Marsh, one of the missionaries of the American Board, tells of present conditions among the people who were the objects of relief work last winter on the Turkish-Bulgarian border and in Macedonia. About 8,000 refugees have returned from Bulgaria to their former homes, and many are now repairing or rebuilding their houses. In some districts few have returned, probably because of lack of confidence. The missionaries and others associated with them in the relief work have been helping the returned families to re-establish themselves and become again self-supporting. Mr. Marsh writes that tools and draught cattle are needed by many who can not be supplied from the very slender means in hand. Clothing and bedding are also needed for the coming winter. With this help, the returned ones will be enabled to make their own way and earn food for their families. Any reader interested in the work may address him at Malto Turnova, Adrianople Vilayet, Turkey.

Rejected Manuscripts Published

A Chance for Unknown Authors

Knowing that stories are arbitrarily rejected by publishers solely for the reason that the authors are unknown, and believing that among the rejected are stories as good or better than many that are printed, I have decided to publish a new magazine known as "THE WASTE-BASKET," in which ONLY rejected contributions and the works of the unknown shall be printed. All MSS. shall be copyrighted in the author's name, free of expense, which copyright shall remain his or her property; provided the authors shall pay ten dollars per MSS. of not over one thousand words and one cent for each word in excess thereof. Remittances must accompany MSS.; none others will be considered. MSS. not available will be returned and remittances refunded with suggestions—free of charge—as to needed revision. It is calculated that the charge will fall far short of the cost of maintenance of the magazine during its first year; yet no expense will be spared to raise "THE WASTE-BASKET" to the highest standard of excellence.

Having exercised censorship over many MSS. I realize that the utmost to-day relies on illustrations rather than on the creations of writers; hence, faith in their own abilities may find NAME, FAME and FORTUNE in contributing to "THE WASTE-BASKET." Address:

Church Union in Canada

OUR friends across the Canadian frontier have taken a step which is likely to have far-reaching and momentous results. Three denominations—the Congregationalists, the Methodists, and the Presbyterians—have adopted the initial measures to unite their efforts for aggressive Christian work. If the union should be effected, as now seems probable, and if it should work harmoniously, as we most devoutly hope, the example will surely be followed in both lands. The advantages of union are so obvious, the saving of money and effort will be so great, the elimination of rivalry, and consequent avoidance of discord is so desirable, that members of the denominations in other countries ize this huge territory. The perplexing problem was fully considered, and the project so often mooted during the past years, for a union of the three churches, was revived and greeted with favor.

"It was decided to refer the question to the standing committee of each denomination, and later call a meeting of the joint committees. This was done, and the joint meeting, also held in Toronto, was largely attended and marked by cordial good will and earnestness of purpose. The representatives committed themselves to union, and referred the matter to the annual meetings of the several denominations. The Presbyterian Assembly and the Congregational Union in June discussed the question at length, and appointed large committees to deal with the matter. The Methodist General Conference is a quadrennial gathering, but steps will no doubt be taken to give their standing committee the needed authority. And now a meeting of all three committees is called at Toronto in December, when it is expected that the movement will take another great step forward toward its realization.

"Of course there are difficulties to be overcome, and the greatness of these will not be fully seen until the basis of union is considered. The question of creed, I think, should present no great obstacle, as there is at present an unwritten one which in reality represents the religious life of the three denominations. The differences in church government and polity are also often in theory rather than in practice. Still, with this great similarity in creed and polity it may not be easy to find basis which will be acceptable to all.

"The benefits of the Union no one can fully estimate. It will prevent the overlapping of effort; it will effect a large saving in the duplication of college and missionary expenditure, and will give a needed impetus to aggressive Christian work throughout the country. A Union would give us a Church far superior in efficiency and power to either of the three denominations working separately or to the aggregate service of all three, divided as they now are. And may not the example of Canada have an effect in other lands and help on the movement toward a world-wide union of the forces of Jesus."

surely ask themselves whether, what is being done in Canada, may not be done in their own land. It will be a great boon to the Dominion, if by this step it inaugurated a general movement so beneficial and so eminently Christlike.

The present status of the movement is explained in the following communication we have received from Rev. J. P. Caven, who is familiar with the facts:

"A March last, an informal meeting was held in Toronto, of representatives of the Congregational, Methodist, and Presbyterian Churches, at which the spiritual needs of the country were considered. The population of the Great West is increasing by leaps and bounds, and it will be greatly increased after the completion of the great trans-continental line, now projected by the Grand Trunk Railway. The church can adequately respond to the demands for men and money to evangel-

Work in Our Possessions*

OPINIONS may differ about the wisdom of our attempting to govern outside dependencies, but there can be no difference of opinion as to our obligation toward the natives, as our Government has undertaken the duty. The Christian people of the United States must give them the Gospel. The churches have recognized the necessity, and it remains for us to see that they are supplied with funds for the work. Hawaii, the ground has been prepared for us. Though it is little more than eighty years since the people were savages, they are now, thanks to missionary labor, civilized and nominally Christian. The English language is taught in the schools, the Bible is everywhere read, churches have been built, and the way for the preacher is open.

Alaska, too, since it has come under American rule, the labors of Dr. Sheldon Jackson and his colleagues of the Presbyterian Church, of the Moravian missionaries, the Quakers at Douglas, the Baptists at Adiak, and the Methodists at Unalakleet have opened the way for a vigorous campaign. The industrial schools at Sitka have impressed the coming generation with the value of Christianity. There are already eight thousand converts, and the door is opened wide for evangelistic work.

In the Philippines the situation is less encouraging. While our Government is diligently laboring to bring order out of chaos, there are necessarily prejudices to contend with, but a hopeful beginning has been made. Methodists, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, Disciples, Moravians and Congregationalists are already at work and our own church has over six thousand members. More money and more workers are needed, and with these a blessing is sure to come on that enormous field with its millions of people.

In Porto Rico, the beginning is scarcely made. Under former conditions the door for Protestant labor was fast closed, but now, under our own flag, there is an opportunity which must be used to the full.

It is an interesting and momentous fact that there are heathen under our own flag who need to be taught the first principles of Christianity and to have the Word of God in their own language. The duty of the Churches of America toward these wards of the nation is obvious. It would have been well, if it could have been done, for the funds contributed for the purpose to have gone into one common treasury, so as to avoid duplication of effort and to have presented Christianity in its unity to them. This, however, was not possible, and it remains for each church to do its utmost, working in hearty co-operation with other churches for the salvation of souls.

Sunshiners Have an Outing

THE next annual meeting of the International Sunshine Society will take place at Niagara, on the third Thursday in May. Last year the meeting in the Waldorf Astoria, Manhattan, was attended by 3,500 persons. The Sunshine branches of the Western Division, Canada and nearby States, will be greatly benefited by the annual meeting being held in Niagara, and it is hoped that a new impetus will be given the work in those localities.

The fact that the annual meeting has never before been held outside of New York City, makes the acceptance of the Western Division's invitation a great honor, and it devolves upon every one of the 6,000 Sunshiners in this section of the State to assist the general and Western Division officers in making it a success.

Mr. E. F. Olmstead, on behalf of the Natural Food Company, has proffered the use of the large assembly hall in the Conservatory building for the general meetings. Council and executive meetings will be held in the adjoining rooms, and a reception and ball will be held at the International Hotel in the evening.

A dinner will be given for the presidents either in Buffalo or at Niagara Falls, and a musicale, theatre party and outing will be special features of the programme.

TWO LITTLE SUNSHINERS

Reduced railroad fares will be obtained, and a circular containing further details will be mailed to the presidents in the near future.

The annual meeting will bring to Niagara Falls representatives of the Sunshine Society from every State in the Union and also a number from several foreign cities.

H. W. Macdonald, superintendent of the Hillcrest Sunshine Lodge, at Livingston Manor, New York, states that forty children have had from a month to two months outing on the farm, during the summer. The lodge will be kept open all winter.

For the fresh air work of the society this summer, through the month of May, June, July and August, Manhattan contributed $736.31, Brooklyn $306.18, and other sections of Long Island $312.14. A recently organized work, under the auspices of the I. S. S., is the Nursery and Kindergarten for Blind Babies.

The board of lady managers of the Home for Crippled Children, New York, has placed at our disposal two large rooms in the fine "old Turnbull mansion," at Bartow-on-the-Sound. These rooms (unfurnished) are given absolutely rent free, and the spacious, well-shaded park, sloping gently down to the blue waters of the Sound, makes an ideal playground for the little cripples and blind babies.

Answered Prayers

V. S. M., Virginia. "I was in great bodily distress, and besought the Lord that he would heal me. He graciously heard and answered me."

A. F., Brooklyn, N. Y. "Recently, when in circumstances of great anxiety and perplexity, I remembered it was my privilege to call upon God. I did so trustfully, and very soon deliverance came."

M. A. "I want to add my name to the list, as I have had my prayers answered many times. I know and believe God is able to answer prayer."

A Reader. "I wish to acknowledge my faith in prayer. I was in the depths, and God heard and answered my prayer. Glory be to his holy name."

J. C., Chicago. "I want to acknowledge God's goodness to us in answer to prayer when clouds hung darkest. He is a prayer-hearing and answering God."

Mrs. E. H., Minnesota. "I have had a most remarkable and definite answer to prayer, and want to acknowledge publicly the Lord's goodness to one so unworthy."

Mrs. E. A. O., Seattle. "I have had many a prayer answered. I put my whole trust in my heavenly Father. He has helped me when earthly friends could not. He is all in all to me."

A Reader, Ohio. "The Lord heard and answered my prayers when I was troubled, and there is nothing too small for me to take to the Lord when I feel that I want to be guided. I am a firm believer in prayer."

Mrs. G. S. M., Bridgeport, Conn. "The Answered Prayer column has been a great help to me, and I promised the Lord I would publicly acknowledge it. He not only heard and answered, but far exceeded my petition. I am continually praying for more guidance and light in knowing his will."

Mrs. Rooney W., Cape Girardeau. "Again I am constrained to acknowledge God's goodness to me. He has been my preserver and helper all through life, answering my prayers and saving me from many great troubles."

E. L. S., Utica, N. Y. "For nearly fifty-five years I have been trusting in the dear Lord Jesus, and he has never failed me. Many, many times in trouble, I have gone to my Heavenly Father and he has delivered me, just as he promised."

Mrs. H. S. B., Olean, N. Y. "I wish to acknowledge God's answers to prayer. I was in very great trouble and was given faith to claim the promise in Mark 11: 24. I received answer wonderfully in part, and am expecting the entire fulfillment."

G. W. J., Sabetha, Kan. "I was afflicted with a great sorrow such as none but God could remove. I earnestly begged him to help me bear it. I arose from my knees feeling that all would be well. If we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us."

R. F. S., Milwaukee, Wis. "Let me add my testimony to the goodness and mercy of God, who answers the prayers of all who are in sorrow and despair. 'And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that I will do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son' (John 15: 7)."

Mrs. R. C. K., Oklahoma. "I formed the habit early in life of taking every care and trouble to the Lord in prayer. I have often found it a source of comfort, and have felt that the Saviour was with me and strengthened me more after a close communion with him."

M. E. B., Delhi, Iowa. "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayers. Truly 'God works in a mysterious way, his wonders to perform,' and will surely hear the humble cry of his children when they call upon him, in believing faith, and is more willing to give good gifts to his children than an earthly parent is."

A. D. B., Quincy, Ill. "It does me a world of good to read the Answered Prayer column. I wish to add my testimony. I was in great trouble, but God has answered my prayer and lifted the burden. Praise his holy name. And though he does not always answer just as we would have it, it is well, his way is always best."

T. H. S. "God has given me help in trouble, when I was called to go through great suffering. I could never have endured it without his help, and I wish to thank him publicly, that the faith of others may be increased."

T. L. "Hoping that some doubter may read and doubt no more, I give you the following: Death came close to my dear wife. I prayed to Christ for her life, if it be his will; if not, to give me grace and peace to bear that which I could not bear alone. Closer and closer came that dread messenger, my wife's dear hands in mine. 'Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil.' I repeated and repeated. I trusted. It was well with me. Should it be death or life. The dark angel passed and the life of my beloved one was given to me and my children. Words cannot describe the sustaining power of God's grace while I waited in the 'valley of the shadow,' and my prayer is that no one who is Christ's follower will ever doubt his help in time of need."

CALLED HIGHER

Entered into rest at his home at East Onondaga, N. Y., on May 15, 1904, Harrison Bostwick, at the age of eighty-four years. He had been a Christian from early youth, was a member of Plymouth Congregational Church of Syracuse, N. Y., and always tried to make his life and influence felt for good.

Mira Mary Kellison, born May 4, 1880, died April 19, 1904; she united with the First Baptist Church of Orangeville, O., three years before her death. She was a very sincere Christian worker at home and abroad. Wherever the opportunity was offered her, she improved the time.

Mrs. Sabra E. Park, of Cardiff, N. Y., after a long illness, passed away February 14, 1904, age fifty-eight years eleven months, fourteen days. Was postmistress twenty-three years. She was a patient sufferer and lived a faithful Christian life.

Anna Elizabeth Rechten, of Jersey City, daughter of Heironymus G. and Emilie; born in Hoboken, N. J., in 1872; called by the Father, July 22, 1904, at 8 A. M. She was a devoted Christian all her life, ever ready to do that which was right. Accomplished, worthy, beloved, Jesus called her away from all earthly suffering and care to be with him.

Mrs. Mary Hudson, of Metz, Mo., died July 20 of hemorrhage of the lungs, in her seventy-first year. She had been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church over fifty years.

One year ago August 13, 1903, Mrs. Margaret Cochran died, beloved by neighbors, friends and family. She was born in Union Town, O., on the 13th of September, 1823. Through life she pursued a loving, hopeful, benevolent and beautiful way, ministering to others rather than desiring to be ministered to. Mrs. Cochran was a member of the First Congregational Church of Akron.

Mrs. Julia Wells died July 31, at her late home, 113 South High Street, Mount Vernon, N. Y., in her ninety-second year.

Mrs. Laura W. Hamlen, of Bennington, Vt., was laid to rest on September 2, 1904. She had been a member of the First Baptist Church for sixty-five years, having joined in October, 1839.

Latest Suits $12 or Overcoats

Fine All-Wool Made-to-Measure Garments

A large variety of the hand-somest and newest weaves, colorings and patterns to select from. Made up as you choose from this year's fashion plates by expert tailors. Style, Quality, Fit and Wear—woven fashioned and sewed into every garment.

Our Woolens "all wool" convey no deal of the value of cloth. To have value for wear in men's suits the wool fibre must be of long staple and be made into cloth having solidity, resisting power, tenacity and elasticity. This is the sort we use, as we get it direct from the mill, where we know how it is made and of what character of wool. Any wool fibre that is "long enough" to have two ends can be used for woolen cloth, but it doesn't need an expert to know that such material has small wearing quality and no shape-holding character in the finished garment.

Our Worsted These are the highest quality long staple wool fibres, the finished garment possessing lustre, softness of handle and fineness of texture. The threads in the fancy worsteds are composed of two and three fold twists, and in durability and color holding qualities our garments are superior to any offered where near our prices in made to measure garments.

Overcoatings The materials of which our overcoats are made are of the same high grade wools as our Woolen and Worsted Suits. The characteristic density and body without excessive weight. The object is to combine warmth with style and comfort. Our measure will enable you to take your own measurement accurately; a perfect fit is guaranteed. We are manufacturers, importers and custom tailors, and guarantee our $12 suits and overcoats to be equal in wear to the best you can obtain from your dealer for Twenty Dollars, while in style and fit our garments are incomparably superior to any but the product of the pricier city tailors.

A FIRE BRIGADE IN JAPAN

ities like Tokio, Osaka, Yokohama, and Kioto, there are modern up-to-date fire-fighting forces, fully equipped with the latest appliances; but for the most part, a Japanese firebrigade, particularly in rural districts, is a quaint and very old-fashioned institution. The is a curious pagoda-like watch-tower, in which a look-out man is stationed. In Japan, houses are not built of steel, or one, or brick, or even wood, but of the inflammable material of all substances — paper. Therefore it seems hard to see why the fire brigade should exist at all, because in the ordinary way long before it could get to the spot with its antiquated appliances the fire would have done its work and burned out.

JAPANESE "TURNING OUT" FOR A FIRE.

But it is not only the paper houses that make fires so frequent in Japan—it is the earthquakes, which occur with more or less severity throughout the year.

The turn-out or muster of a Japanese rural fire brigade is a most amusing spectacle of combined picturesqueness and grave officialdom. There are hose-pipes and hand-pumps that apparently date back to the dawn of history, and there are many serious-looking banner-bearers, and men carrying the prettiest of Japanese paper lanterns. There are even Buddhist priests, pronouncing incantations and giving their moral support to the strangely-clad firemen, whose official uniforms are plastered all over with many weird, cabalistic devices.

A HOUSE OF BREAD

FROM Italy comes the news of a new theory just put forth by Signor Sangiorgi, a rich Italian philanthropist. He declares that there is one thing to which every one who enters the world has a right—bread. The signor has just written a book to prove that it is the duty of the State to provide bread for all its inhabitants as cannot afford to buy it. He has established at his own expense, at Massalombarda, a "House of Bread," to put his theory into practice and furnish the government with an object lesson as to the beneficence and practicality of his system. One immediate consequence of the opening of this establishment has been to reduce the price and improve the quality of the bread supplied by private bakeries in the neighborhood.

Signor Sangiorgi proposes that the government should establish similar institutions throughout Italy, where bread will be furnished to the general public at almost cost price, to charitable institutions at cost price, and to the needy for nothing. He contends that properly conducted, they could be made self-supporting, the profits derived from those who buy bread of them defraying the cost of what is given away. If any surplus remains, he would invest it as a reserve fund, so that in periods of exceptional distress the State bakeries might be able to meet the increased demand for free bread.

Of course, the bakers themselves are strongly opposed to the project. They declare that the general adoption of such a system would ruin them, and that bread cannot be sold cheaper than at present without losing money, which would leave no gains to pay for the bread that is given away. This last statement, however, is proved false by experience. At Catania and Palermo, the latter a city with 37,000 inhabitants, bread-making has been taken over by the municipalities, with the result that bread in these places is much cheaper than when the public were dependent on private bakeries for it, while the municipalities make a substantial profit out of the business.

Signor Sangiorgi argues that the interests of those concerned in private bakeries should not be allowed to weigh in the balance against the welfare of millions, to whom cheap bread is a matter of vital concern. As under his proposed system the State bakeries would turn out only the plainer kinds of bread, private bakers would still have the trade in fancy brands entirely in their hands.

Regarding the contention that free bread would increase pauperism, Signor Sangiorgi points out that it would be quite feasible to devise safeguards, by which the distribution of free bread would be practically restricted to those who could not afford to pay for it. In any event, he contends, the benefits of the system would far outweigh any evils that might result from its adoption.

The Italian philanthropist's idea recalls the experience of a certain well-known restaurant on Broadway, New York, which, for years past, every winter, has distributed bread free to thousands in the midnight hours. The Bowery Mission has also fed thousands of unemployed in the past four years, with bread and coffee, for three months in winter. A few years ago, during a time of great suffering in New York, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bread Fund fed for four months nearly 12,000 persons daily. In these cases, there was no doubt about the deserving poor being the sole beneficiaries.

The Campaign in Manchuria

MANCHURIA is rich in walled cities. However formidable these may have been considered in ancient wars, they seem to interpose but slight obstacles to the progress of a modern army equipped has been a fighting ground for many ages. The Koreans and the Mings have both risen, flourished and faded away on this land of mountain and plain. It was from Moukden that the Manchu princes descended upon Pekin with heavy artillery. New Chwang and Liao-Yang proved indefensible as strongholds, and now that the Japanese are converging on Moukden, their superiority in heavy armament may cause the Russians to select Tie-ling, forty-five miles farther north, as the more advantageous point at which to make a decisive stand.

Tie-ling, owing to its situation at the apex of the irregular and triangular Liao plain, and to its large stores of grain, and owing also to the fact that roads from the Yalu (especially a military route from Feng-wang-cheng via Sai-ma-chi and Ying-Pan), converge there, is of considerable military importance. The river and caravan traffic of Tie-ling is enormous. The Russian railway has given a great impetus to business. Many caravan and trade routes centre at Tie-ling, and it has intercepted much of the trade that formerly belonged to Moukden. The walled town is densely crowded with business hongs, the area being comparatively small. The walls are of brick externally, stone on the inner face, and the wide space between is filled in with rough stone and mud. The two suburbs, east and west, contain three-quarters of the population, which numbers probably 40,000. Twenty-five miles north of Tie-ling is Kaiyuan, another walled city, commanding the leading highways of central Manchuria. It may yet play no unimportant part in the military campaign.

According to the cable dispatches, Gen. Kourapatkin has moved a large portion of his army (over 125,000 troops) to Tie-ling, leaving Gen. Stachelberg with 30,000 troops, including a large force of Cossacks, to hold Moukden. Gen. Kouroki with a Japanese army was reported to be in the Hun river valley, and a battle at Fu-Shun, thirty miles east of Moukden, was regarded as probable. There has been no serious engagement since that at Liao-Yang. It is unlikely that there will be any actual fighting in Moukden, since both sides have consented to observe the wish of China that the Manchu tombs should not be desecrated. These tombs lie to the east and north of Moukden, and include the graves of the father and grandfather of the first Manchu emperor, besides many royalties and persons of distinction whose names are venerated by the natives.

The district of Moukden is one which has been a fighting ground for many ages. The Koreans and the Mings have both risen, flourished and faded away on this land of mountain and plain. It was from Moukden that the Manchu princes descended upon Pekin about 1640 with their victorious armies, shattering the power of the Ming dynasty in a furious battle at Shan-kai-kwan, where the great wall meets the sea. Moukden, during the Ming dynasty, was a small Chinese town of little importance. The founders of the rising Manchu power, however, selected the spot for their capital, but their star rose so rapidly that they soon found themselves in Pekin. Moukden was not, therefore, for any long period the headquarters of the Manchus, but their historical connection with the city is kept conspicuously in memory by the presence of the tombs.

Moukden to-day is an imposing-looking city, well planned and skilfully laid out. Its brick wall, sixty feet high, rests on strong stone and concrete foundations. It has eight grand gateways, with watch-towers and batteries, that remind the visitor of mediæval fortresses. There is, besides, an inner wall, loop-holed for defence. Well-made roads intersect the city at regular intervals. In the centre of Moukden is the ancient Manchu imperial palace—a miniature of that at Pekin. There are temples of Heaven and of Earth where sacrifices were offered in the imperial name. Of the 250,000 population, four-fifths are pure Chinese, 20,000 are Mohammedans. Strangely enough, though Manchu names and fashions still prevail in the ancient city, it is difficult to find any person who speaks the Manchu language.

Late dispatches from the East indicate that Japan is preparing for a protracted war. In an address to the leading bankers at Tokio, Count Okuma warned the nation to expect a long war. He said that if the hostilities lasted two years they would cost 2,000,000,000 yen. He predicted that the Government would have to borrow 500,000,000 yen next year, and declared that the country must be ready to face depreciation in the national securities. He calculated that the war would cost Russia more than 3,000,000,000 rubles. Russia has immense resources and enormous advantages in size, population and natural wealth. Therefore Japan must inevitably make great sacrifices to secure final victory.

Divine Protection.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

It is always the object of the enemy of souls to keep our eyes upon the visible: man, circumstances, ourselves: it is the work of the Holy Spirit to show us the invisible; he who overrules all which we see, and which we might hear. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about those that fear him, and delivereth them;" nearer, than the angel and the person which we fear, as G.'s army surrounded Elisha (II. Kings 6:7), coming between him and the army of enbadad. While we look at the unseen, "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Nothing can happen but by God's permission; and all things are for our sakes. How silly then, as well as sinful, to fear men or things, when God is present to reverse all, or to turn it into blessing. Cannot God reverse the situation, whenever and wherever his children are in a difficulty? It is easy to say: "This is an age of miracles." Certainly it is in an age of faith. The absence of miraculous works at Nazareth was not occasioned by any lack of power or will in the Lord Jesus. "He could there do mighty work" (Mark 6:5, 6), and he was hindered because of their unbelief. God changes not: Jesus Christ is still "the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever." How few are the eyes which see him! How few they are who endure as seeing him who is invisible! He could, he would do many things which are conditional on a faith on our part, which is withheld from him. How easy everything became when Elisha could find a man who trusted him! Elisha was not afraid that suddenly his hidden enemies would see, and fall upon him. He undertook to be their guide, not knowing who it was that thus accosted them, unable to help themselves, they allowed themselves to be led: the march of a blind army recorded in history. One of the curses prophesied against Israel if they should not hearken and obey their God was this: "The Lord will smite thee with blindness . . . and thou shalt grope at noonday as the blind gropeth in darkness" (Deut. 28:29); but that curse, when Elisha was besieged, fell upon their enemies. Thus the blind army was led at Elisha's will, and led them to Samaria. They were in a trap; in the very royal city of their enemies, and helpless! Then Elisha prayed again. How easy prayer is to one wholly given up to God, and in the constant habit of trusting him! "Lord," he prayed, "open the eyes of these men, that they may see." And the Lord opened their eyes, and they saw, and behold, they were in the midst of Samaria. Some children of God think: "I will go to God to a test, and see if he will work a miracle for me." Oh, is it possible that man can put God on the level of a conjurer, and ask him to do his wonders simply for his satisfaction? King Herod thought such a thought in his heart. When the Lord Jesus was brought before him in judgment, "he was exceedingly glad, for he was desirous to see him of a long season, because he had heard many things of him, and he hoped to have seen some miracle done by him;" (Luke 23:8). But when Herod would come as a sinner to the Saviour, that the miracle of a new birth might be wrought in him, it would be utterly impossible that the Lord Jesus, who was there and then working out in his own person the salvation of men of all ages from sin, could turn aside to gratify the curiosity of a lost sinner like Herod! Let us beware in what spirit and to what end we seek of the Lord a manifestation of his power! When Jehoram saw that his enemies were at his mercy, he said to Elisha: "My father, shall I smite them?" "Thou shalt not smite them," was the indignant answer. "Wouldst thou smite these whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword and with thy bow? Set bread and water before them." And he prepared great provision for them, and sent them away. They returned to Benhadad, not with Elisha as a prisoner, but with a strange story to relate of this man's prayers, and God's instant answers.

The City of Perpetual June

LIFE IN CARACAS, THE "LITTLE PARIS" OF THE SOUTHERN CONTINENT--ITS PEOPLE TIRED OF WAR

BY A SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT

FEW cities in the world can boast of a more delightful site than Caracas, for, though but six miles distant from La Guayra—one of the hottest cities in South America—it lies in an inland valley, three thousand feet above the sea. Here the climate is like a perpetual June, with now and then, in the rainy season, a hint of April, and occasionally, at midday, a brief sensation of July. So delightful is it that the traveler would never suppose it to be unhealthy unless warned, as he invariably is, to be careful. Then he learns that lung and throat troubles are prevalent, that one may catch a dangerous fever, and, though the city has a temperate climate, that it is not quite the same as a city in the temperate zone. Furthermore, the water is not good, although this is said to be due to the ashes left on the hillsides by charcoal burners, and is not the fault of nature.

The valley or basin of Chacao, in which Caracas is situated, is about four leagues long by one in width, and is one of the most fertile spots in Venezuela. High above it on all sides tower the green mountains, with here and there the line of a winding railway to be seen, or perhaps one of the old, paved Spanish roads. On the foothills and across the plain, extend sugar and coffee plantations, gardens, and orchards, while to the south of the city is an extensive rural cemetery, an unusual sight in South America, where the dead are generally buried, as in Eastern lands, in niched walls or open vaults.

Caracas, which, by the way, is not so very much larger than it was a century ago, is similar to other Spanish-American cities, except in its wealth of gardens and parks, and some pretentious public buildings. Buenos Ayres, of course, and several capitals in the south far surpass it; but among the northern cities of the Continent, Caracas styles itself the "Little Paris," and certainly has many features to be proud of.

With all their attempts at magnificence, however, Caraqueños have a wholesome fear of earthquakes, and never sacrifice the safety of a building for the sake of mere outward adornment. For even if the memory of the terrible disaster of 1812 were to grow dim, there pean capital; its churches and public buildings were kept in excellent repair; its citizens vied with one another in making their homes attractive; and the whole atmosphere of the town suggested prosperity and enterprise. Now, alas! the streets are dirty and ill-paved; the public buildings are shedding their stucco; churches and bridges, monuments and parks, seem alike neglected; and the very furniture of the homes tells of decayed fortunes and hard times. And the cause of it all (apart from the unavoidable fall in the price of coffee), has been civil strife—the curse of every Spanish-American republic south of Mexico.

But, while Uruguay and possibly two other countries have had more frequent outbreaks, and Chile has witnessed bloodier battle scenes, Venezuela seems to have suffered more from revolutions than any of her sister republics. Peru, indeed, was in a more wretched condition after her war with Chile, and the Paraguayan nation was ruined and almost annihilated in its hopeless struggle against Argentine and Brazil; but these were foreign wars, and, in neither case, quite chargeable to the victims. Venezuela, however, has brought her tribulations largely upon herself, and in the peace that now exists—a general stock-taking, as it were—the people are opening their eyes to the fact that another decade such as the last, might be their final ruin.

Perhaps a better word than "peace," would be "exhaustion." The country is thoroughly exhausted; its coffee and cocoa plantations have been neglected; thousands of good laborers have been killed or maimed for life, the live stock has been greatly reduced, many country roads are in an impassable condition, tradesmen have become bankrupt, incalculable suffering has been caused,—and all to gratify the ambitions of rival have been many more recent warnings, including a succession of shocks in 1900, which caused a number of deaths and kept the entire population in a panic for several weeks. To be strictly correct, however, the city of to-day is not the city of twenty years ago. Then its streets and plazas were as clean as those of a Euro-

THE BIRD MARKET IN THE PLAZA, CARACAS

The Wickedness of War

A LAY SERMON BY COUNT LYOF TOLSTOI*

TRANSLATED BY V. TCHERTKOFF AND I. F. M.

HOW can so-called enlightened men preach war, support it, participate in it, and, worst of all, without suffering the dangers of war themselves, incite others to it, sending their unfortunate defrauded brothers to fight? These so-called enlightened men cannot possibly ignore, I do not say the Christian law, if they recognize themselves to be Christians, but all that has been written, is being written, has and is being said, about the cruelty, futility, and senselessness of war. They are regarded as enlightened men precisely because they know all this. The majority of them have themselves written and spoken about this.

Not to mention The Hague Conference, which called forth universal praise, or all the books, pamphlets, newspaper articles, and speeches demonstrating the possibility of the solution of international misunderstandings by international arbitration—no enlightened man can help knowing that the universal competition in the armaments of States must inevitably lead them to endless wars, or to general bankruptcy, or else to both the one and the other. They cannot but know that besides the senseless, purposeless expenditure of millions of roubles, i. e., of human labor, on the preparations for war during the wars themselves, millions of the most energetic and vigorous men perish in that period of their life which is best for productive labor. During the past century wars have destroyed 14,000,000 men. Enlightened men cannot but know that occasions for war are always such as are not worth not only one human life, but not one hundredth part of all that which is spent upon wars. In fighting for the emancipation of the negroes, much more was spent than it would have cost to redeem them from slavery.

A Degrading Thing

Everyone knows and cannot help knowing that, above all, wars, calling forth the lowest animal passions, deprave and brutalize men. Everyone knows the weakness of the arguments in favor of war, such as were brought forward by De Maistre, Moltke and others, for they are all founded on the sophism that in every human calamity it is possible to find an advantageous element, or else upon the utterly arbitrary assertion that wars have always existed, and therefore always must exist, as if the bad actions of men could be justified by the advantages or the usefulness which they realize, or by the consideration that they have been committed during a long period of time. All so-called enlightened men know all this. Then suddenly war begins, and all this is instantly forgotten, and the same men, who but yesterday were proving the cruelty, futility, the senselessness of wars, now think, speak and write only about killing as many men as possible, about ruining and destroying the greatest possible amount of the productions of human labor, and about exciting as much as possible the passion of hatred in those peaceful, harmless, industrious men, who by their labor feed, clothe, maintain these same pseudo-enlightened men, who compel them to commit those dreadful deeds contrary to their conscience, welfare and faith.

Stupefied by prayers, sermons, exhortations, by processions, pictures and newspapers, the cannon's flash, hundreds of thousands of men, uniformly dressed, carrying divers deadly weapons, leaving their parents, wives, children, with hearts of agony, but with artificial sprightliness, go where they, risking their own lives, will commit the most dreadful act of killing men whom they do not know and who have done them no harm. And they are followed by doctors and nurses, who somehow imagine that at home they cannot serve simple, peaceful, suffering people, but can only serve those who are engaged in slaughtering each other. Those who remain at home are gladdened by news of the murder of men, and when they learn that many of the enemy have been killed they thank some one whom they call God.

All this is not only regarded as the manifestation of elevated feeling, but those who refrain from such manifestations, if they endeavor to disabuse men, are deemed traitors and betrayers, and are in danger of being abused and beaten by a brutalized crowd, which, in defence of its insanity and cruelty, can possess no other weapon than brute force.

It is comprehensible that a heathen, a Greek, a Roman, even a mediæval Christian, ignorant of the Gospel and blindly believing all the prescriptions of the Church, might fight and, fighting, pride himself on his military achievements; but how can a believing Christian, or even a sceptic, involuntarily permeated by the Christian ideals of human brotherhood and love which have inspired the works of the philosophers, moralists, and artists of our time—how can such take a gun, or stand by a cannon, and aim at a crowd of his fellow-men, desiring to kill as many of them as possible?

Opposed to Christianity

The Assyrians, Romans, or Greeks might be persuaded that in fighting they were acting not only according to their conscience, but even fulfilling a righteous deed. But, whether we wish it or not, we are Christians, and however Christianity may have been distorted, its general spirit cannot but lift us to that higher plane of reason whence we can no longer refrain from feeling with our whole being not only the senselessness and the cruelty of war, but its complete opposition to all that we regard as good and right. Therefore, we cannot do as they did, with assurance, firmness, and peace, and without a consciousness of our criminality, without the desperate feeling of a murderer who, having begun to kill his victim and feeling in the depths of his soul the guilt of his act, proceeds to try to stupefy or infuriate himself, to be able the better to complete his dreadful deed. All the unnatural, feverish, hot-headed, insane excitement which in time of war seizes the idle upper ranks of society, is merely the symptom of their recognition of the criminality of the work which is being done.

Ask a soldier, a private, a corporal, a non-commissioned officer who has abandoned old parents, his wife, his children, why he is preparing to kill men whom he does not know, he will at first be astonished at your question. He is a soldier, he has taken the oath, and it is his duty to fulfil the orders of his commanders. If you tell him that war—i. e. the slaughter of men—does not conform to the command, "Thou shalt not kill," he will say, "And how if ours are attacked—for the King—for the Orthodox faith." One of them said in answer to my question: "And how if he attacks that which is sacred?" "What do you mean?" I asked. "Why," said he, "the banner." And if you endeavor to explain to such a soldier that God's commandment is more important not only than the banner, but than anything else in the world, he will become silent, or he will get angry and report you to the authorities.

Excuses for War

Ask an officer, a general, why he goes to the war. He will tell you that he is a military man, and that the military are indispensable for the defence of the fatherland. As to murder not conforming to the spirit of the Christian law, this does not trouble him, as either he does not believe in this law, or, if he does, it is not in the law itself but in that explanation which has been given to this law. But, above all, he, like the soldier, in place of the personal question, what should he do himself, always puts the general question about the State, or the fatherland. "At the present moment, when the fatherland is in danger, one should act, and not argue," he will say.

Ask the diplomatists who, by their deceits, prepare wars, why do they do it. They will tell you that the object of their activity is the establishment of peace between nations, and that this object is attained, not by ideal, unrealizable theories, but by diplomatic action and readiness for war. And, just as the military, instead of the question concerning one's own action, place the general question, so also diplomatists will speak about the interests of one's native land, about the unscrupulousness of other Powers, about the balance of power in Europe, but not about their own position and activities.

Ask the journalists why, by their writings, they incite men to war, they will say that wars in general are necessary and useful and they will confirm this opinion of theirs by misty patriotic phrases and, just like the militarist and diplomatist, to the question why he, a journalist, a particular individual, a living man, acts in a certain way, he will speak about the general interests of the nation, about the State, civilization, the race. In the same way, all those who prepare war will explain their participation in that work. They will perhaps agree that it would be desirable to abolish war, but at present this is impossible.

Men of our Christian world and of our time are like a man who, having missed the right turning, the further he goes the more he becomes convinced that he is going the wrong way. Yet the greater his doubts the quicker and the more desperately does he hurry on, consoling himself with the thought that he will arrive somewhere. But the more comes when it becomes quite clear that the way along which he is going will lead to nothing but a precipice, which he is already beginning to discern before him.

Mutual Destruction

In such a position stands the Christian humanity of our time. It is perfectly evident that, if we continue to live as we are now living, guided in our private lives as well as in the life of separate States, by the sole desire of welfare for ourselves and our State, and will, as we do now, try to ensure this welfare by violence, then, inevitably increasing the means of violence of one against the other and of State against State, we will, first, keep ruling ourselves more and more, transferring the major portion of our productiveness to armaments; and, secondly, by killing in mutual wars the best physically-developed men, we will become more and more degenerated and morally depraved.

That this will be the case if we do not alter our lives, is as certain as it is mathematically certain that two non-parallel straight lines must meet. But not only is this theoretically certain in our time; it is becoming certain not only to the mind, but also to the consciousness. The precise towards which we approach is already becoming apparent to us, and the most simple, non-philosophical, and uneducated men cannot but see that, by arming each other in war, we, like spiders in a jar, can commit nothing else but the destruction of each other.

A sincere, serious, rational man can no longer comfort himself by the thought that matters can be mended as was formerly supposed, by a universal empire such as that of Rome, or of Charles the Great, or Napoleon, or by the mediæval spiritual power of the Pope or by sacred alliances, by the political balance of the European Concert, and by peaceful international tribunals, or, as some have thought, by the increase of military strength and the newly discovered powerful weapons of destruction.

It is impossible to organize a universal empire or republic, consisting of European States, as different nationalities will never desire to unite into one State, to organize international tribunals for the solution of international disputes? But who will impose obedience to the decision of the tribunal upon a contending party who has an organized army of millions of men? To disarm? No one desires it or will begin it. We are dashing on towards the precipice, cannot stop, and are approaching its edge.

For every rational man who reflects upon the position in which humanity is now placed and upon that which it is inevitably approaching, it cannot but be obvious that there is no practical issue out of this position, that one cannot devise any combination or organization which would save us from the destruction towards which we are inevitably rushing. Not to mention the economical problems which become more and more complex, those mutual relations between the States arming themselves against each other, and at any moment ready to break out into wars, clearly point to the certain destruction towards which so-called civilized humanity is being carried.

Then What is to be Done?

Two thousand years ago John the Baptist, and then Jesus said to men: "The time is fulfilled, and the Kingdom of God is at hand: bethink yourselves, and believe the Gospel!" (Mark 1: 15); "and if you do not bethink yourselves you will all perish" (Luke 13: 5).

But men did not listen to them, and the destruction foretold is already near to hand. And we men of our time cannot but see it. We are already perishing, and, therefore, we cannot leave unheeded that—old in time, but for us new—means of salvation. We cannot see that besides all the other calamities which flow from our bad and irrational life, military preparations are made, and the wars inevitably growing from them, must finally destroy us. We cannot but see that all the plans of escape invented by men from these evils are found and must be found to be ineffectual, and that the disastrous position of the nations arming themselves against each other cannot but go on advancing continually. And, therefore, the words of Jesus refer to our time more than to any time or to any one.

Jesus said, "Bethink yourselves"—i. e., "Let every man interrupt the work he has begun and ask himself: Who am I? From whence have I appeared, and in what compass my destination? And having answered these questions, according to the answer decide whether that which thou doest is in conformity with thy destination." And every man of our world and time, that is, being acquainted with the essence of the Christian teaching, needs only for a minute to interrupt his activity, to forge the capacity in which he is regarded by men, be it emperor, soldier, minister or journalist, and seriously ask himself who he is and what is his destination—in order to begin to doubt the utility, lawfulness and reasonableness of his actions.

Before I am emperor, soldier, minister, or journalist, must say to himself every man of our time and the Christian world, "before any of these I am a man—i. e., an organic being sent by the Higher Will into a universe endless in time and space in order, after staying in it for an instant, to die—i. e., to disappear from it. And, therefore, all those personal, social, and even universal human aims I may place before myself, and which are placed before me by men, are all insignificant, owing to the shortness of my life as well as to the boundlessness of the life of the universe, and should be subordinated to that higher aim for the attainment of which I am sent into the world. This ultimate aim, owing to my limitations, is inaccessible to me, but it does exist (as there must be a purpose in all that exists), and my business is that of being its tool—i. e., my destination is that of being a workman of God, of fulfilling his work." And having understood this destination, every man of our world and time, from emperor to soldier, cannot but regard differently those duties which he has taken upon himself or other men have imposed upon him.

So that however strange this may appear, the most effective and certain deliverance of men from all the calamities which they inflict upon themselves and from the most dreadful of all—war—is attainable, not by any external general measures, but merely by that simple appeal to the consciousness of each separate man which, one thousand nine hundred years ago, was proposed by Jesus—that every man bethink himself, and ask himself, who is he, why he lives, and what he should and should not do.

Religion the Remedy

The evil from which men of our time are suffering is produced by the fact that the majority live without that which alone affords a rational guidance for human activity—without religion; not that religion which consists in belief in dogmas, in the fulfilment of rites which afford a pleasant diversion, consolation, stimulant, but that religion which establishes the relation of man to the All, to God, and, therefore, gives a general higher direction to all human activity, and without which people stand on the plane of animals and even lower than they. This evil, which is leading men to inevitable destruction, has manifested itself with special power in our time, because, having lost all rational guidance in life, and having directed all efforts to discoveries and improvements principally in the sphere of technical knowledge, men of our time have developed in themselves enormous power over the forces of nature; but, not having any guidance for the rational adaptation of this power, they naturally have used it for the satisfaction of their lowest propensities.

Bereft of religion, men possessing enormous power over the forces of nature, are like children to whom powder or explosive-gas has been given as a plaything. Considering this power which men of our time possess, and the way they use it, one feels that considering the degree of their moral development men have no right, not only to the use of railways, steam, electricity, telephones, photography, wireless telegraphs, but even to the simple art of manufacturing iron and steel, as all these improvements and arts they use only for the satisfaction of their lusts—for amusement, dissipation and the destruction of each other.

Then, what is to be done? To reject all these improvements of life, all this power acquired by humanity —to forget that which it has learned? This is impossible. However perniciously these mental acquisitions are used, still they are acquisitions, and men cannot forget them. To alter these combinations of nations which have been formed during centuries and to establish new ones? To invent such new institutions as would hinder the minority from deceiving and exploiting the majority? To disseminate knowledge? All this has been tried, and is being done with great fervor. All these imaginary methods of improvement represent the chief methods of self-oblivion, and of diverting one's attention from the consciousness of inevitable perdition. The boundaries of States are changed, institutions are altered, knowledge is disseminated, but within other boundaries, with other organizations, with increased knowledge, men remain the same beasts, ready any minute to tear each other to pieces, or the same slaves they have always been, and always will be, while they continue to be guided, not by religious consciousness, but by passions, theories and external influences.

Man has no choice; he must be the slave of the most unscrupulous and insolent among slaves, or else the servant of God, because for man there is only one way of being free—by uniting his will with the will of God.

Men who are intentionally and unintentionally stupefying the people by church superstitions should cease to do so, and recognize that what is important and binding in Christianity is not profession of dogmas, etc., but only love to God and to one's neighbor, and the fulfilling of the commandment of acting toward others as one wishes others to act towards oneself—and in this lies all the law and the prophets.

The Will of God Supreme

If only both pseudo-Christians and men of science understood and preached to children and to the uneducated these simple, clear and necessary truths as they now preach their complicated, confused and unnecessary theories, all men would uniformly understand the meaning of their lives and recognize one and the same duties as flowing from this meaning.

Such is the law of life. Practical welfare is attained not when man strives towards this practical welfare, but only when man, without thinking of the attainment of practical welfare, strives towards the most perfect fulfilment of that which before God, before the Source and Law of his life, he regards as right.

So that the true salvation of men is only one: the fulfilment of the will of God by each individual man within himself—i. e., in that portion of the universe which alone is subject to his power. In this is the chief, the only destination of every individual man, and at the same time this is the only means by which every individual man can influence others, and, therefore, to this, and to this only, should all the efforts of every man be directed.

AND HIS RESIDENCE, CARACAS

And Caracas is becoming busy again—a hopeful sign for the country at large. The road from La Guayra is again dotted with pack donkeys bringing merchandise over the mountains, while the southern roads are blocked at times with long trains of these little beasts carrying coffee and cocoa and various agricultural products into the city, and returning with supplies for the country estates and for stores along the way.

city leaders and their train of intuitable office seekers. Caracas, however, has its gay side as well as its sombre aspect. The marching of troops, the musical entertainments provided two evenings in the week by an excellent municipal band, the social flurry caused by a reception at one of the Ambassadors, or a reunion at the fashionable club, the "Concordia," the mad revelry of Carnival, and the enjoyment of the constantly recurring feast days,—all these do much to relieve the tension that otherwise would become unbearable, and to make life pass pleasantly.

There are signs of renewed commercial life everywhere. The railway depot, the market, and the local factories show greater activity; shops and warehouses are carrying larger stocks; building operations are beginning again, and the street hucksters cry out their wares with a more cheerful assurance of patronage than before.

"If we could only have peace!" says the foreigner, and the wish finds echo in the heart of the native, even though he is opposed to President Castro and his selfish policy of plunder and aggrandizement.

"Anything is better than civil war!" is becoming a popular expression, and the pity is that the Venezuelan does not amend it, and say, "With honest elections, civil war will be impossible." With such conditions, the prosperity and progress of Venezuela would be assured.

Good Work in the Bowery Mission

A YEAR RICH IN SPIRITUAL RESULTS REPORTED BY THE SUPERINTENDENT

EVERY reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is interested in the old Bowery Mission, and its wonderful work among the homeless and unemployed men and boys of New York. In the broadest sense, the Mission is a Cosmopolitan one, for not only do its beneficiaries come from all parts of the Union, but its influence may be literally said to be transcontinental, for its converts are to be found even in the remotest parts of the world.

In his report for the twelve months preceding October 5, 1904, Superintendent Hallimond gives a most interesting and encouraging account of the work of the Bowery Mission. Briefly summarized, the year's work is presented in these figures:

Attendances at meetings	131,250
Meals given	147,997
Lodgings given	5,283
Articles of clothing given	349
Situations found	956
Professed conversions	2,280

"It is a matter of the utmost gratification," writes the Superintendent, "to know that the interest manifested in our regular nightly meetings was never at a higher pitch than at the present time. Even during the summer months, when it is generally so difficult to attract a crowd to an indoor meeting, the number of attendances this year has suffered scarcely any appreciable diminution, whilst at the larger meetings of Sunday morning and Thursday evening, it has not been an unusual thing for hundreds to be turned away from the doors.

"Never since the commencement of the Mission has there occurred anything that has so enhanced its work and influence as the early morning breakfasts, which you instituted last January. For seventy cold winter mornings in succession, a long line of poor, shivering men stood awaiting this hospitality, and each morning one thousand homeless men were fed. The Mission is now, more than ever, regarded as a refuge for the distressed.

"As a means of interesting and attracting to the Mission the permanent residents of the Bowery, as well as affording some kind of relief to the monotonous social life of these men, the concerts, held weekly from October to May, were most successful. We had the assistance of the best musical talent of the city, and the audiences were very large.

"The death of Mr. Victor Benke, our beloved organist, touched profoundly the hearts of thousands of unfortunate men who knew and loved him.

"At the beginning of October, 1903, I instituted a weekly class-meeting, which has proved a great blessing to our converts and workers. We have had an average attendance of between fifty and sixty, and a keen interest has been maintained throughout. The class has gone through a regular course of lessons on the subject of prayer, taking Andrew Murray's little book, 'With Christ in the School of Prayer,' as a guide in its studies.

"The Sunday morning prayer meeting is the meeting at which requests for prayer that come through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are submitted. It has been well attended throughout the year.

"I wish to acknowledge with thanks the help that has been rendered to the Mission by the Memorial House, 242 East Broadway. About fifty of our converts live there, under the care of Mr. Card, the superintendent, who is himself one of our converts.

It can readily be seen what an advantage this is to our men, especially their early Christian experience.

"The figures given of professed conversions (2,280), are as near as can come to what we regard honest and genuine declarations of faith in Christ. It is impossible to give exact figures. One could easily multiply the number by ten, so as hand-raising and penitent-f demonstrations have gone; but our after-meetings we put each see through a very close examination and only record those whom we believe to be thoroughly sincere.

"Every week, however, we receive encouraging news from all parts of the globe, that convinces us that numbers of men receive the seed sown by the Mission into 'good ground.' 'L bread cast upon the waters,' it is said after many days, 'where, who can say Dr. J. B. Devins recently met a missionary in the heart of India, who told him he was converted in the Bowery Mission.

"Only a few days since, I received a letter from a business man in New Mexico, saying that many years ago he was converted in the Bowery Mission. Last winter a young man was put in charge of the large, pleasant Sunday Afternoon Meetings of the Y.M.C.A., Birmingham, England, who, four years ago, was led to Christ in the Bowery Mission.

"Our 'Help Each Other' Society has been able to help many of our members when in need. Our Savings Bank Agency encourages them among our men.

"I desire to thank you for the continued and unflinching sympathy and support that you, and the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, have accorded to the work of the Bowery Mission. In this expression of gratitude, I am joined by my co-workers and by thousands of men who have come within the radius of its kind and helpful influence."

J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent

AN EARLY MORNING BREAKFAST AT THE BOWERY MISSION

After the Peace Congress

SEVERAL important incidents marked the closing session of the International Peace Congress, which adjourned in Boston on October 8, to meet next year at Lucerne, Switzerland. One of its last acts was the adoption of resolutions denouncing war, and urging international obligatory arbitration treaties. It also recommended an inquiry by the Powers into the condition of affairs in the Congo Free State. The resolutions on this subject are as follows:

Whereas, The International Association of the Congo obtained in 1884 from the American government, an agreement that its flag should be recognized as that of a friendly State (which recognition was subsequently endorsed by the Powers of Europe at Berlin), on the ground that it was an organization formed to protect the interest and welfare of the natives, to promote legitimate commerce, and to preserve the neutrality of the Congo Valley, over which it sought to exercise authority;

Whereas, The agents of the government of the Congo Free State and the people over whom that government exercises authority, are foreign to it, and the country whence it primarily controls the Congo territory is also foreign to it;

Whereas, The proceedings of the International Association, prior to its recognition by the government of the United States, constituted in the words of Mr. Kasson, American Minister in Brussels, and from the point of view of international law, "mere acts of piracy";

Whereas, It is alleged that the government of the Congo Free State has appropriated the land of the natives and the products of commercial value yielded by the land, thus leading to the commission of grave wrongs upon the native races, and to the infringement of the rights secured for international commerce by the acts of the conference at Berlin;

Whereas, This is a question which may lead to grave international complications.

This Congress, in the interests of peace, recommends that the following questions should be referred either to a renewal conference of the Powers concerned in the formation of the Congo Free State or to the Court of Arbitration at The Hague:

First—Is the government of the Congo Free State still to be regarded as the trustee of the Powers which recognize the flag of the International Association?

Second—Is the Belgian government to be regarded as responsible for the actions of the government of the Congo Free State?

Third—In either of these events, what is the position of the Congo Free State in international law, and in what manner may the grave questions concerning its alleged actions be satisfactorily and competently determined?

After some discussion, it was agreed to strike out from the resolutions the reference to Belgium's responsibility, and they were then adopted.

Resolutions were adopted, expressing deep gratification at the international treaties already arranged; also requesting the United States government to collect and print for public distribution all available data as to the cost of war.

The adoption of an "Appeal to the Nations" was the last official act of the Congress. It recites that the Congress assembled under peculiar circumstances—a murderous war raging in one quarter of the globe, and in the other the friends of peace gathering in greater strength than ever before. The Russo-Japanese war, the Appeal declares, might easily have been avoided, if the two belligerents and the other Powers signatory to the Hague Convention had faithfully kept the obligations assumed in that Convention. The Appeal proceeds:

This war has made it clear that much yet remains to be done in the eradication of old race and national prejudices, false ideas of national greatness and glory, perverted conceptions of patriotism and territorial and commercial greed. This war has also anew demonstrated the necessity of the immediate extension and perfecting of substitutes for violence in the settlement of international controversies.

The Congress, at the conclusion of its deliberations, appeals to the peoples of all nations and of all classes to arouse themselves to a finer and more adequate conception of their relations one to another, to a deeper sense of their mutual dependence and duties to the community of both their material and spiritual interests, and to their rights in the determination of the foreign policies pursued by their governments, that they may no longer be involved without their consent in foolish and ruinous wars with other Powers, or the unjust exploitation of those whom they are bound every consideration of righteousness and honor to assist to elevate rather than to plunder and degrade.

It respectfully invites all the national sovereigns and presidents, all men in positions of public trust, all ministers of religion, all instructors of youth in schools of every grade, all the owners and conductors of both the religious and secular press, and all others who wield influence in the molding and directing of public opinion, to throw the entire weight, not only of their personal influence but of their positions, towards eradicating the causes of misunderstanding and conflict, and the creation of such a complete system of international adjudication, and such a wide-reaching public sentiment as will in time render the barbarous method of war impossible.

One of the interesting incidents of the last day's session was the brotherly greeting on the same platform of Dr. John Chirwig, delegate from Russia and Dr. Jiro Abratani, of Japan. As the Russian moved toward him, Dr. Abratani grasped his extended hand in friendly clasp amid the applause of those who sat near at hand.

On October 12, a number of the delegates visited New York. A public meeting was held in Cooper Institute, at which addresses were delivered by Baroness von Suttner, of Austria; Peter Curran, of the English Federation of Trades Unions, and several others. The Baroness urged that the United States, as a great and powerful nation, should take the lead in the movement for universal peace. She asked those in the audience who desired universal peace to rise, and the great gathering rose en masse.

7,000 Children His Audience

Evangelist Torrey Addresses a Remarkable Gathering in Bolton, England

THE most remarkable meeting that Bolton has ever seen," said a leading medical man of this town, as at one o'clock on Sunday morning last, we left the Drill Hall together to make our way home.

His remark had reference to a Drunkards' Meeting which had just concluded, and which was the most notable of the series of gatherings which Dr. Torrey and Mr. Alexander had been conducting in that part of England. Situated in the very heart of the manufacturing county of Lancashire—Bolton, grim, dismal and bidding-looking, has a population of about 170,000. Cotton-spinning is the staple industry, and on every side huge, massive mills stand up like giant penitents, the tall chimneys vomiting out great volumes of black smoke which darkens the atmosphere and shuts out the sunlight.

The religious life of Bolton is marked by much lethargy and indifference. There are thousands to whom the church makes no appeal, and whose lives are lived outside of all religious environment. Work, as a rule, plentiful; the men and women employed in the mills receive fairly good wages, but, unlike their near neighbors in Yorkshire, the people are inclined to be thriftless. Unkenness is common. On Saturday nights, till a late hour, men, women, boys and girls parade the principal streets, this stream of aimless humanity being much augmented by the weekly inrush from adjacent country districts. Then it is that the town takes on its saddest aspect. The saloons are busy, women as well as men drinking openly at the bar. When unable to contain more liquor the drinkers are pushed out into the street, there to fight and quarrel till some good maritan leads them home or a police-officer conducts them to the lock-up.

Into such a town as this then did the Torrey-Alexander Mission come, carrying with it God's message of love and salvation. It was felt that here was a good field for a drunkards' meeting, and so a drunkards' meeting came to be organized. At half-past ten on Tuesday night two processions started out to visit the saloons in the worst quarters of the city, with the object of inviting the men and women found in these to a night meeting in the large Drill Hall. Heading each procession was a brass band. The men in the ranks carried flaming torches, and to the music of familiar gospel hymns, the sweep of the streets and the saloons is commenced.

An hour later the processions had returned and the service was ready to begin. It was indeed a curious spectacle that presented itself to the eye. In the afternoon nearly seven thousand happy children had met in the same place, and six hundred and fifty of them had fully yielded themselves to the Saviour. What a contrast to that picture now. Instead of the bright, innocent faces of the little ones looking up from every corner of the large building, the chairs were occupied by men and women, ragged, dirty and forlorn, on whose faces sin had left its ugly stain. Again the hall was packed—for the third time that day. A great many were more or less under the influence of liquor. The youth just entering upon the dignity of man's estate sat side by side with the old man whose hold of life is daily becoming feebler; the girl not yet out of her teens was there with the woman old in sin—a more heterogeneous gathering could not have been found.

Assisted by the two bands which had paraded the streets—one belonging to the Salvation Army and the other to the Wesleyan Church—Mr. Alexander started the singing with the "Glory-Song." A few in front beat time to the music, swinging their arms and stamping their feet; but, considering the character of the audience, the order was remarkable.

"I am glad to see you men," said Mr. Alexander to the vast crowd in front of him. Then, seeing that the singing was dragging because of the lack of hymn-books, he cried to the stewards to distribute gratuitously his books among the people—an announcement which was received with hearty applause. The impression created by the opening song was wonderful to behold, and now having the great mixed gathering completely under control, Mr. Alexander led off with that graphic word-picture of Christ's suffering, "When I survey the wondrous Cross." Every heart was touched, and it was with wet eyes that many sang the words—

See from His head, His hands, His feet,
Sorrow and love flow mingled down.
Did e'er such love and sorrow meet
Or thorns compose so rich a crown.

"Where is my wandering boy to-night?" was next sung. Under the influence of these hymns, the bravado and resistance of men and women completely broke down. After a prayer, Mr. Alexander sang a solo.

"How many of you men have a mother in heaven, no matter who you are?" he asked. Numerous hands went up. "I am going to sing you a song," he continued; "Tell mother I'll be there." Through the singing of that song, many a poor fellow has got ready to meet his good old mother on the other side. You look at it while I sing." Then his rich baritone voice went up in song, and the impression on hearts was made deeper yet.

Amid the solemn hush which followed the singing, Dr. Torrey rose to speak, and at once got into touch with his strange audience. "I want to give you five words," he began, "just five words that will tell you what Jesus can do. You will find them in Hebrews 7: 25. 'He is able to save!' That is what Jesus Christ can do," he proceeded. "He can save. Who can he save? Anybody. That looks like an ordinary Bible, doesn't it?" he asked, holding aloft his own Bible. "But it is a very remarkable Bible. You find in that Bible the names of thirty men who gave it to me. These thirty men are officers in my church in Chicago, and I want to tell you about some of them." Then he went on to show how that the men whose names appeared in his Bible had been rescued from lives of sin, and were now helping others into the Christian life.

The Rev. W. S. Jacoby, Dr. Torrey's assistant pastor in Chicago, followed with a short address. He knows what sin is, for his own career has been a most varied and wonderful one. With a voice full of compassionate love, and with a pathos that came from his heart, as if it were bursting, he told that curious company of men and women before him how Christ had saved him from the awful wretchedness and misery of sin. That was the burden of his whole message—the love of Christ for perishing sinners. "No matter how deep you are in sin," he said, "Christ can save you."

In response to Dr. Torrey's invitation, many men and women came forward to the platform and shook their hand, in token of their desire to lead a better life. Then they passed the front of the platform in a long line, each being conducted by a worker to a seat where they might be personally dealt with. There were many human wrecks in that company of seekers after Christ. One of the ministerial secretaries discovered in rags an old schoolfellow of his own, and another gentleman had a somewhat similar experience, seeing in one of these broken-down men a former associate of his own in a Bible class. But perhaps the most miserable looking object of them all was a woman, from whom all trace of womanliness had been stamped. Half-intoxicated, ragged and dirty, she looked a perfect picture of depravity and despair. From her seat on the platform Mrs. Alexander had been watching this woman throughout the proceedings. When she came to the front, Mrs. Alexander rose to meet her, and together they went off to a quiet part of the hall. It was with some difficulty that Mrs. Alexander got the woman to realize her position. "God loves you," said Mrs. Alexander. It was more than the other woman could grasp. That God could love such as she seemed beyond her comprehension, but at last turning her bloated face to the lady by her side, she said, "Will you give me a kiss?" It was a test from which anyone might have shrunk; but Mrs. Alexander met it bravely, and bending down she imprinted the desired kiss, and thus gladdened the poor woman's heart.

The Mission that has just ended has been the most remarkable in the experience of Bolton. Night after night the hall was packed, and during the few closing nights remarkable scenes were witnessed. Two outstanding meetings were those held for children, on two succeeding Saturday afternoons. At one of these 700 little ones came to the front and confessed Christ; at the other, 650 made a similar confession. The town has been stirred as it never has been before. Everywhere the Mission has been the principal theme of conversation, and on every hand one hears remarkable testimonies.

Altogether the professed conversions during three and a half weeks number close upon 4,000, and though this does not show all that has been accomplished there is profound gratitude for the great outpouring of blessing.

The Best of Its Kind

NOW that the International Peace Congress has finished its work and adjourned, the friends and advocates of peace and arbitration can review its labors with a feeling of genuine satisfaction. For the first time in the history of American Peace Congresses, the results are such as will be of practical service, for instead of wasting time in the discussion of theoretical reforms, it boldly attacked the present-day evils that militate against the peace and happiness of mankind, and characterized them in language which, while sufficiently temperate and dignified for all parliamentary requirements, was yet strong and convincing. In this age of rampant militarism, when, as one of our American statesmen recently remarked, even the people of our own land seem to have been infected by the virus of war, it is a distinctly courageous thing for a deliberative body of cultured men and women, representing the advance guard of Christian civilization, to raise the peace standard amid the flutter of battle-flags and the beating of war drums throughout the world.

In dealing with the topic of international treaties, it was made clear, both in the speeches and resolutions, that the progress lately made in this direction among the leading nations, is such as to afford encouragement to peace-lovers to hope that the movement to submit all causes of difference arising between governments to the decision of an arbitration tribunal, may yet become world-wide. Disarmament, the Congress evidently regarded as still afar off, but the spread of arbitration carries with it the reasonable hope of military and naval reduction and the substantial lessening of the burden of taxation.

On Aug. 3, last, far in advance of the Congress, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in an editorial, outlined the more important work to be accomplished. An extract from the article in question appears in another column. It is gratifying to note that every suggestion then offered seems to have appealed favorably to the delegates. Their united action with respect to a practical peace propaganda, the expediency of friendly mediation at the proper time between Russia and Japan, and the bringing of the vexed Congo question—with all its allegations of shocking inhumanity—before the Hague, proved their hearty sympathy with the campaign measures indicated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as deserving of precedence over all others. Very many of our readers have emphasized these views in letters addressed to the officers of the Peace Congress, which have aided greatly in producing this result.

In its "Appeal to the Nations," the Congress declares its attitude and purpose broadly, and asks for the united sympathy and support of all peoples in the war against war. Though somewhat prolix, the appeal is sympathetic and eloquent and should be widely circulated. A wise provision is that made for a literary Peace propaganda, for it is largely by educating the people to a knowledge of the horrible nature and wickedness of war and its ruinous cost, that the peace movement must make headway.

The Congress has made history. It was the best of its kind ever held on American soil. May the Divine blessing rest upon its work, and upon all associated in it, both at home and abroad.

Automobiles and Accidents

IF a new pleasure has been added to life in these days a new peril has also been annexed. Swiftly as a bird flies we seem to cleave the air with a mighty rush, as we speed along in these amazing machines. Business men residing in the suburbs of our great cities have exchanged a seat in the railway car for a seat in their autos, and go independently to and from the office, occasionally forgetting the legal limit of speed and finding themselves checked by a police-officer who springs forth from an ambush. The enchanted carpet of the Arabian Nights is surpassed by this Twentieth Century magical machine.

But delightful as it is to ride in an automobile, the large percentage of accidents, many of them fatal, makes the prudent person tremble. To be pitched out on one's head, to collide with a truck or a cable-car, to run over an old lady or gentleman, to kill a little fellow running across the street—these things are possible one and all. The daily papers chronicle them and, in fact, accidents seem inseparable from the weird-looking vehicles that, however luxurious, are not in the least handsome.

To thread one's way across a city thoroughfare to day, what with the equipages of wealth and the trucks of trade, the omnibus, cars, automobiles, and other menaces to safety, is no easy matter. When we lie down in bed at night, we may in these days add a new clause to our prayers, "Thank God that from sudden death we have been delivered." For it lurks very near us in our very finest modern inventions and appliances.

If a horse is a vain thing for safety, what shall we say of an automobile?

Death in the Barrel

THE singular coincidence of twenty-five deaths, attributed to heart-failure, occurring in eleven days in a district of about fifteen blocks, in New York City, is being investigated by the Coroner and the police. It has been found that the victim in every instance was a whiskey-drinker. It appears that the beverage has suddenly become popular in the neighborhood. One of the saloon-keepers has introduced a new brand of the article. He drew it from the wood, the customer bringing his own bottle, on which the saloon-keeper pasted his label, with the device upon it of an elephant. The pink elephant whiskey became a famous beverage among his customers. It was sold at a very low rate, so low, in fact, that it was less than the government's duty on whiskey. That it must be adulterated was an obvious inference. If he had used water for the purpose, no mischief would have been done other than the mischief which normally comes from the drinking of whiskey. But water would have reduced the potency of the whiskey and thus would have deprived it of its most salable quality. It is charged that he adulterated the liquor with a chemical known as wood-alcohol, or methyl-alcohol, which, though not more poisonous than ordinary alcohol when taken in a single dose, is vastly more so if the dose is small and frequently repeated, as it would be in the case of a moderate tippler. It then becomes cumulative and is serious, if not fatal. Whether the saloon-keeper used this dangerous drug has yet to be proved, and the liquor in his saloon has been sent to the analysts to be tested.

The incident has led to a great deal of startling information being given to the public. Dr. Wiley, Chief of the Government Bureau of Chemistry, expresses the opinion that eighty-five per cent. of all the whiskey sold in hotel restaurants, clubs and bars, is nothing less than a cheap imitation. He adds: "It is my opinion that pure whiskey, except in the most moderate quantities, is an injury to the human system. How much more so must be the adulterated article?"

Dr. Reid Hunt, of Johns Hopkins University, says that there has been a marked increase in the last few years of cases of poisoning from wood-alcohol, chiefly due to the increased use of this substance, as a substitute for methyl-alcohol in liquors. The fact that when it is pure, its dangerous quality is increased, is an important consideration. The Journal of the American Medical Association mentions fifty-four cases as occurring recently, of poisoning by wood-alcohol, to which we have now to add twenty-five more.

The wickedness of sending out this horrible poison is appalling. An instance occurred not long ago in New Jersey, to which attention was directed in these columns, of a saloon-keeper actually insuring the lives of his customers, that he might profit by their death. It is not charged that the saloon-keepers responsible for the recent deaths in New York had any such motive. It appears to have been simply criminal recklessness and ignorance. They wanted to make money, and as wood-alcohol can be purchased at fifty cents a gallon, while the genuine whiskey retails at $2.60 a gallon, the temptation to substitute the one for the other, regardless of consequences, was too great.

No such temperance lesson has been taught in recent times. The liquor-drinker literally places his life in the hands of the saloon-keeper. He does not know what he is drinking. The pure whiskey, according to Dr. Wiley, is bad enough, but when he learns that the saloon-keeper has a direct incentive to mix poison with the liquor he sells, the fact should give him pause.

No Famine in India

OUR readers will rejoice with us that the apprehension of an approaching famine in India has been relieved by a copious downfall of rain. The following letter from the Rev. Frederick Wood, Secretary of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Famine Relief Committee, containing the good news, has just been received:

MY DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:

By this you will probably have received my first intimation of a likely famine over a widespread area, and following this, I have weekly sent local papers an information showing how the gloomy prospects were becoming gloomier. We were but a degree removed from famine. Government had even made its plans for famine relief operations, and had publicly advertised for applications for famine duty. Now, God be praised, the whole scene is changed! After our southwest monsoons (on which we in western India depend for our annual rainfall), had failed and disappeared, and crops had withered, and rivers had become dry beds, and the tanks or lakes were perfectly dry, and wells were empty, God sent us a strong cyclone from the east, which has brought copious rains all over this side—wells are filling, tanks likewise, and rivers overflowing their banks. A wonderful intervention this! And this after the meteorological report stated that it would not touch the Gujarat field! How can we be sufficiently thankful! May it turn the hearts of the people towards Himself. God still works miracles. His people pray and He answers gloriously. With kindest Christian regards, believe me, Yours sincerely, Bombay, Sept. 17, 1904. FREDERICK WOOD.

Advice That Was Heeded

From The Christian Herald, August 3d.

THE time has come for a more active peace propaganda and for the organization of the Peace Movement in the United States on a vigorous working basis that will make its influence felt in State and National councils. Hitherto, the movement has been largely a matter of sentiment but now, thanks chiefly to the energy and devotion of gallant band of peace-lovers in New England, it is no longer a skeleton organization, but one that is daily growing more and more compact and capable of effective service.

It is not enough to adopt resolutions in general terms condemning war. They should urge our own Government to take steps, wherever practicable, in the interest of peace.

While we would not counsel unwise or undiplomatic meddling with the affairs of other nations, yet it should not be forgotten that there are many opportunities which this country might improve in the interest of international peace and good-will. It is highly probable that at no distant date such an opportunity will arise, when either Russia or Japan, or both, will be ready to welcome the proffer of friendly mediation. Again, the frightful condition of affairs on the Congo, the barbarous enslavement of the natives, the disruption and scattering of the Congo villages, and the shocking but well-attested stories of mutilation—a state of affairs equivalent to the worst form of civil war—constitute a legitimate subject of inquiry by the Peace Congress. Our country has treaty rights which would justify it in bringing the whole Congo question before the Hague Conference, and it is entirely within the province of the Boston Peace Congress to urge the adoption of this course in the interest of humanity and for the restoration of peace and security in an African State to which, by virtue of treaty, we stand in the responsible relation of a sponsor.

Here, then, are two living issues for the Boston Congress to deal with. They are more urgent and infinitely more practical than disarmament, which is still very far off.

The Bible and the Newspaper

Crossing the Alps by Balloon

ONE of the most daring ascents ever made, is reported from Switzerland. Captain Spelterini, a famous aeronaut, has succeeded in crossing the Alps in his balloon. He ascended the Eiger Glacier station on the railroad up the Jungfrau, where a departure platform had been erected. To this his balloon was attached. It contained sixteen hundred cubic metres of gas, and was carefully ballasted to allow for the height from which the start was made. As the balloon rose, it was watched with intense interest by the spectators. While still in the lower altitudes, the Captain could be seen taking photographs of the lesser peaks. Gradually the balloon rose until it was lost to view. Later in the day, when the Captain descended safely at Adelboden, he reported that he had enjoyed splendid weather, and had taken several fine photographs. The view of the summits of the Alps was marvelous. The maximum height attained was 20,000 feet. The Jungfrau itself is 13,671 feet high. He passed over the summit, and drifted in the direction of Valais. There the wind changed, and he was carried back toward the Berne Canton, where a landing being considered advisable, the balloon was brought to the ground after its adventurous trip. The scene from the balloon was exceedingly beautiful, the mountain tops viewed from that novel position was most impressive.

The Jungfrau (the maiden) is one of the most famous of the Alpine peaks. It is celebrated in story and romance and adventure. It received its name from the sullied purity and dazzling brightness of the snow, with which it is covered. There was a tradition that no mountaineer had ever climbed to its summit, but in 1811 two Swiss gentlemen succeeded in reaching it, and once then Agassiz, Professor Forbes and others, made the ascent. The railroad up the mountain was commenced in 1898. It is intended to carry it to the summit, where an observatory will be erected. The work is one of extreme difficulty, the gradients in some instances being twenty-five per cent. The grandeur of the scene witnessed by the aeronauts must have been wonderful beyond description. Never before have those snow-clad peaks been viewed from any one on their level. To any one gazing at their vast bulk and meditating on their majestic proportions, how overwhelming must be the prophet's idea of the power of the Almighty.

Who hath measured the waters in the fathom of his hand . . . and weighed the mountains in scales and the hills in a balance (Isa. 40: 12).

The Automobile Race

A great race, which drew together an immense number of spectators, took place in Long Island, N. Y., on Oct. 8. It was a race of automobiles, in which seventeen started. The course was nearly three hundred miles. It was won by an American citizen, resident in France, who drove a Panhard machine. He covered the entire course in five hours and twenty-six minutes, being an average of fifty-two miles an hour. During the day the course was kept free of traffic. One death and one serious injury marked the exciting race. An effort was made before the race to prevent its taking place, as it was foreseen that there was danger in the headlong speed that would be attained, of some being killed, but the courts permitted it to be run. The result of the race was to prove that a certain make of machine was better than the others, and for his purpose a number of men put their lives in peril, and the public was excluded from the use of its highways for the greater part of a day. There must be a defect in our laws when such an exhibition can take place. We seem to have reached that stage of civilization described by the prophet:

THE BALLOON ASCENDING BY THE JUNGFAU

The chariots shall rage in the streets; they shall jostle one against another in the broad ways; they shall seem like torches; they shall run like the lightnings (Nah. 2: 4).

Detected by a Drug

Among detective stories told by a famous member of the European force, is one of a thief being captured through his use of a particular medicine. The case as given to the police was one of a robbery of a young lady. She was lying asleep, when she became conscious of some one moving about her room. By the feigned sleep. He came once near her bed to see if he was observed, but apparently satisfied that she had not seen him, he proceeded with his search. At last having found her jewels, he left by the window from which he had entered. Then the lady rose and screamed, but the police were unable to overtake him. A list of the stolen jewels was given to the detectives, who sent it to all the pawnbrokers in Paris. They had also another clue. The robber had evidently an affection of the throat, for which he used eucalyptus oil. The odor of it was very pungent, and when he bent over the bed the lady recognized it, and mentioned it to the detectives. No trace of the man was found for several weeks, but one day a man offered a jewel to a pawnbroker. It was not one of the stolen jewels, but as his breath had the odor of the eucalyptus oil, the pawnbroker notified the police, who arrested him. A search of his rooms disclosed the missing jewels. It was a small clue, but small clues often lead to the detection of crimes. The lawbreaker never knows what clue he may inadvertently leave behind him. As the wise king said:

The ointment of his right hand bewrayeth itself (Prov. 27: 16).

An Heroic Rescue

The story of a brave rescue comes from Port Huron, Mich. A train was proceeding on October 9 through the St. Clair Tunnel, which runs under the St. Clair River from Port Huron to Sarnia, Ontario. The train, which was going from the American end of the tunnel, and was made up of seventeen coal cars, broke in two in the tunnel. The engineer, with the three cars that still remained attached to his engine, ran out with them, and then returned for the remainder of the train. But there had been an escape of gas, and by the time the engineer reached the stalled cars it was suffocating. He was overcome, and died in his cab. The superintendent heard of the accident, and went to the rescue of the crew of the train, but he too succumbed, as did one of his assistants. Then a switchman started, in spite of the warnings of his friends, to the rescue. He succeeded in reaching the engine, and coupled it to the cars and drew them out of the tunnel. When he emerged he was completely overcome by the deadly fumes, but restoratives were administered, and in the open air he revived. His courage in going to the relief of his comrades undoubtedly saved their lives. It was an heroic thing to do, after he had seen two attempts to rescue them involve the death of the rescuers. We admire such an act of courage, but how many listen unmoved when they are told that the whole human race would have perished had not Christ given his life to save it?

We see Jesus . . . for the suffering of death crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man (Heb. 2: 9).

THE TWO CAPTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

Author of "The Southerners," "A Doctor of Philosophy," "Hohenzollern," etc., etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy, and thence to Austria.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness. By a clever ruse, Macartney compels Garron to let him take the marquis and Louise with him, in one of the ship's boats, while Garron is a prisoner in his cabin, disarmed and guarded by Brébœuf, who has now returned to de Vaudémont's service. Macartney lands his party at Alexandria, and the marquis meets Bonaparte, while the Irish captain sails off to seek Nelson and the British fleet. The marquis discloses Garron's plot to Napoleon, and the latter sets out with a party to rescue Brébœuf. They reach the fleet just in time to save the Breton. Garron, the traitor, is executed instead.

"ALAS, FOR THE KING!"

"Ah, yes, the fatigues of the night. He is an old man. Deal tenderly with him," said Bonaparte.

"Your pardon, gentlemen," said the marquis faintly; as he opened his eyes under the influence of the restoratives which had been promptly applied, "I am a very old man."

"You have done enough in the last twelve hours to break a much stronger man," said Bonaparte kindly.

"Sir," answered the marquis, lifting himself up in Brébœuf's arms, while Louise knelt by him chafing his hands. "You are an incomparable man. When I look upon you I despair. You have laid me under great obligations."

"Discharge them then," said Bonaparte.

"How can I?"

"By giving me the lad here."

"My word, sir, but you seem to have him already," said the marquis.

"But with your blessing, sir, and with your permission. Believe me, I love France. I shall make of it the brightest star in the firmament of nations. The boy—his fortune shall be mine."

"Be it so," said the marquis wearily. "Honoré, you have chosen, not as I would have you choose, but having chosen, walk honorably in the path you have elected."

"Sir, my grandfather," faltered Honoré, kneeling by the old man's side and kissing his hand.

"But as for me," continued the marquis, "General Bonaparte, I am too old to change."

"Nor shall you. Will you come with me to Alexandria? Will you stay here and prepare to take passage on the first ship for France? We'll manage to land you somewhere else if you would not go there."

"Here, if it please you," said the marquis. "I am a sailor, and my granddaughter—"

"I was born on the sea, general," said Louise.

"And Captain Thourars I know of old," continued the marquis, "we have been old friends. We have seen duties differently, but there is something to be said on the other side perhaps. We will accept his hospitality if—"

"It is freely proffered you, sir. You are gladly welcome to my ship," said the gallant Thourars, extending his hand.

"Good! And the English officer who escaped, Brueys?" asked the general.

"We can do nothing with him now. I fancy," said Admiral Brueys. "We might send out a frigate."

"As well search for a needle in a wheat field," said Bonaparte. "He will apprise the English."

"Well, let them come," said Brueys. "I shall be glad to receive them."

Bonaparte's glance happened to fall upon Louise, a soft beautiful flush was in her face at the mention of her lover.

"And you, too, would be glad to receive one of them, mademoiselle?" He laughed. "Well, when you have taken him, Brueys, send him to me. I will see what can be done. And you," said Bonaparte, approaching the gigantic Brébœuf. He was so small that the contrast between the two was laughable—only no one laughed at Bonaparte. The general stood on tip-toes, and took the big sailor by the ear.

"Ah, ah, my friend," he cried, "I came at the very moment. Will you serve me and the Republic?"

Brébœuf shook his head. He glanced toward the marquis, toward Louise, toward Honoré, he extended his hands and pointed toward the little group, then laid his hand on his heart.

"Well, well," said Bonaparte in high good humor, "as you please. You are a brave man. Admiral Brueys, I don't like the fleet as it is. The English can turn your flanks if they come. This place is not defensible. They can mass upon one wing of your line and crush it. You should take precaution to cover these flanks. If that cannot be done you must go to Alexandria or, failing that, to Corfu, which is inaccessible to them. The future, the success of this expedition, depends upon you. When we have pacified Egypt, India will fall into our hands—if we command the sea!"

"General," said Brueys, "we cannot get into Alexandria with these heavy ships and there are not enough provisions in the fleet to go to Corfu. The English will not turn our flanks. They would not dare; and, anyway, should they appear we would get under way and meet them under sail."

"Very well," said Bonaparte, shrugging his shoulders. "Unfortunately, I am no sailor. One cannot be everything. Would to God I were! What is your advice, monsieur?"

"Sir," answered the marquis, "I can give no advice to the enemy of my king."

"Bah!" said Bonaparte scornfully. "Well, look to it Brueys, look to it!"

"Sir," said Louise, coming forward, "do not think because my grandfather loves the king that we are ungrateful. What you have done for me, for my brother, cannot be estimated. I, too, have loved the king. I, too, am a de Vaudémont. But—forgive me, monsieur—" she said, turning to her grandfather—"perhaps had I been a man, I should be willing to stand by my brother's side and follow your fortunes. From the bottom of my heart, I thank you. I shall always pray for your welfare, for your happiness."

She took Bonaparte's hand in her own. Before he divined what she was about to do she lifted it to her lips and kissed it. 'Twas an honor she would have paid to no one but her king.

"I thank you, mademoiselle," said Bonaparte, deeply touched. "Come back to France some day. She needs women like you. Permit me," He laid his hand gently upon her head, lifted it, and brushed his lips lightly to her forehead, and was gone.

"A wonderful man, a wonderful man!" murmured the marquis, thoughtfully, when they were alone again. "Alas, alas, for the king!"

BOOK SIX—Nelson

CHAPTER XXX

THE "VANGUARD" GETS THE NEWS

FOUR days out from Alexandria, Macartney, by a combination of luck and skilful forecasting, had the good fortune to fall in with Nelson's fleet, which had made a complete circle about the eastern half of the Mediterranean, without finding the French fleet, and was now en route for Egypt a second time. He had first boarded the Culloden, the nearest ship to his small boat, and afterward, by Nelson's orders, had been taken to the flagship, which the news he had brought had been signaled Captain Troubridge. Aboard the Vanguard, Nelson was waiting for him at the gangway.

It was a different Nelson from the captain of Agamemnon, with whom we began this story. Five years had passed over his head, and he looked as if he had gone through the vicissitudes of twenty. His right sleeve, empty of an arm, was pinned to the breast of his coat. In the place of his right eye, there was an empty socket. He was thinner, paler, more fragile than ever, a very whiff of a man. He looked as if a wind of a cannon-shot might blow him away. He was so nervous and so excitable that he could not stand still. In the face of his officers and the ship's company, Nelson threw his arm around his beloved subordinate and fairly hugged him.

"What's this news you bring?" he cried, scarce giving Macartney time to breathe. "The French, say—"

"Are in Aboukir, Sir Horatio."

"How many sail?"

"Thirteen of the line."

"Their rating?"

"One of 120, three 80's, and nine 74's."

"And we have thirteen 74's, and a fifty-gun ship. It's a beautiful match with the odds heavily in the favor. Just what we want. How did you leave them?"

"At anchor in line ahead, when I took my departure L'Orient with Brueys' flag, the three-decker, you know, sir, with two of the 80's supporting fore and aft at the centre. They lie about half a cable's length apart. The line, which is slightly convex, runs, roughly speaking, from north to south for about a mile and half."

"Are they moored? Have they springs on the cables?"

"They hadn't when I left, sir. They were riding a single anchor. They may not be there now, however."

"What?"

"It was said in the fleet that they were going to Corfu, or Malta, or perhaps to haul into Alexandria they could."

"If they should not be there, I think it would be a pity," said Nelson. "Macartney, you cannot know what this month has been to me."

He passed his hand over his brow, and brushed back that great shock of hair, already greying from illness and anxiety.

"No one can know what I have suffered. Not a frigate, not a scout boat of any kind, except that little brig yonder which Hardy has. I prayed for light ships 'Want of frigates' if I should die, would be found written on my heart. Where were you? Where's the Inconstant, by the way?"

Not until he had mastered every detail of the French position had he thought to inquire as to Macartney's personal affairs, or even as to the condition of the frigate.

"I lost the Inconstant, admiral," said Macartney sadly. "I would rather have lost my arm."

"I am sure it was from no fault of yours, Sir Robert," said Nelson, kindly.

"Thank you, sir. Just as we passed Malta, on the 20th of June, we ran into the French fleet on a foggy, misty, rainy night. They were sailing very irregularly. I caught sight of the lights of one division, and edged down toward them to make sure. When I found out what they were, I bore up and tried to get away, and in the rain and darkness ran slap into another division. One of these ships ran us down, stove in our larboard side to the water's edge. I cut loose with the batteries and did the best I could, but even the Inconstant was no match for half a dozen French frigates with a liner atop. I was laid out by a shot through the shoulder—"

"Are you all right now?" interrupted Nelson again.

"Yes, Sir Horatio," said Macartney, "my arm is a little stiff and pains a little, but I am practically a warrior."

"That's good. Go on!"

"I was taken aboard Le Tonnant, a magnificent eighty-gun ship, the finest ship-of-the-line I ever saw."

"If they could only fight ships as they build them, there might be some excitement when we meet," said Nelson smiling.

"Yes, sir. Well, I escaped from Le Tonnant."

"How?"

"The captain is that same Jean Garron that led the attack upon that old tower from which we rescued the Marquis de Vaudémont."

"And his granddaughter?" added Nelson smiling.

"Yes, of course, five years ago. You remember it, sir?"

"Perfectly."

"They happened to be prisoners on the ship too——"

"Ah!"

"They had nothing to do with my escape, however, so far as I am concerned, it was made very easy for me."

"How was that?"

"Garron is an infernal scoundrel! He agreed to surrender Le Tonnant to you so soon as you came in sight, to use his influence to keep the French where they were—in short, to lend you every possible aid."

"Why did he offer to do that?"

"I think he does not stand well with the present French authorities, sir, and I presume he knew you were going to catch the French anyway, and wanted to get in on the winning side."

"Umph!" said Nelson.

"However," said Macartney, "I wouldn't count on his help."

"Why not?"

"I rather think he will be a dead man before you get to Aboukir."

"Why?"

Thereupon, Macartney related to his admiral the whole story of the proposed visit of the Marquis and his granddaughter to Bonaparte, with the incriminating paper he had signed.

"What do you think the French general will do with the marquis?" queried Nelson, as the tale was unfolded.

"I don't know. I hope he will treat him well. Meanwhile, you can imagine how anxious I am to get back."

"I can, indeed," said the admiral, mildly. "Tell me—if I may ask a personal question—how go your love affairs?"

"Well, indeed, admiral, but for the sake of the frigate."

"Never mind that. You have brought me the information I wanted. It is worth a dozen frigates. Has fortune smiled upon your suit for the hand of the French girl?"

"Yes."

"I hate a Frenchman," said the English admiral, hotly. "I have but three principles in life—obey orders, honor the king, and fight the French. But that marquis seemed rather a good sort; he knows a ship and can fight certainly. And his granddaughter—well, I can understand your feelings."

"Have you a chart of the bay, Sir?"

"None."

"I have a rough map given me by Garron, but as to the depth of water or anything of that kind, of course I cannot say."

"Do you think there will be room enough for us to pass around the head and get to the rear of the French line?"

"I do not know what the depth of the water will be, admiral, as I said."

"Where there is room for a French ship to swing, there is room for an English ship to pass. Is it not so?"

"Quite so, admiral."

"Now," said Nelson, noticing the look of utter weariness on the face of Macartney. "You are dead beat out, aren't you? Of course you will be my guest till I can do something for you in some way. Go into the cabin there. We'll look over everything in the morning. No, not a word! Orders!"

"Good night, admiral," said Macartney, smiling and turning away.

"Good night, old friend," said Nelson, patting him on the shoulder. "You have made me the happiest of men with your news. Good night. God bless you!"

CHAPTER XXXI

THE BAND OF BROTHERS

ON the morning of the first of August, the day being bright and beautiful, they were off the harbor of Alexandria. Nelson detached the Swiftsure and Alexandria, which were to the leeward of the main fleet, and ordered them to run down toward the harbor to ascertain if the French were in there; while, with the rest of the fleet, he held his course to the eastward for the Bay of Aboukir. At ten o'clock in the morning, the two ships mentioned had drawn near enough to the Pharos to get a view of the harbor. They signaled, that there were no ships or transports and a few small war vessels in Alexandria. By this time, the fleet had drawn some eight or nine miles ahead of them. The ships were carrying sail hard, and going rapidly before the fresh north-east breeze.

About three o'clock in the afternoon, a set of signals was run up to the masthead of the Goliath, but, owing to the haste with which they had been bent on, the toggles of the flags were improperly secured, and the signal could not be read. Before it could be repeated, however, the Zealous, which was practically running a neck-and-neck race with the Goliath for the honor of leading the fleet, flung her signals to the wind, and the watchers on the ships read the news that the French fleet was in Aboukir.

Across the low, sandy spit which forms the west side of the Bay of Aboukir, lookouts on the two leading ships had caught a glimpse of the tall spars of the vessels of the French, swinging quietly at their anchors. They were run down at last! The quarry they had so furiously pursued, was there before them. There was no useless haste about the movements of Nelson now. The fleet bore up until it had passed the promontory of Aboukir, and had drawn abreast of a little island called by the French, L'Isle Bequière, upon which Brueys had established a battery of four twelve-pounders and two thirteen-inch mortars. The breeze was so strong that they could not carry their topgallant sails on the wind.

It was known that the water in Aboukir Bay was very shoal, and it was evident that this shallow water

The Goliath and Zealous were racing for the lead. Foley was quicker than Hood. The instant the watchers on the poop saw the black balls of the rolled-up flags traveling toward the masthead of the Vanguard, without waiting for the stops to be broken, Foley, who had everything in readiness, actually flung out his studding sails, and swept to the head of the line, wrestling, by his adroit seamanship, the place from the gallant and scarcely less ready Hood.

Confusion resolved itself into order with astonishing quickness. The noble ships swung into line with a celerity and accuracy that amazed the beholders. The Vanguard was well up with the advance, but Nelson very properly hove to the flagship, and allowed the Orion, the Audacious, and the Theseus, to precede him, thus taking his position in the centre of the line with the Vanguard, closely followed by the Minotaur, the Defence, the Bellerophon and the Majestic. Far behind the fleet came the lumbering Culloden, and farther away along the coast, came the Swiftsure and the Alexander. Tailing after the Majestic was the Leander, which really had no business at all in the line of battle. If Nelson had not been so intent upon the French ahead of him perhaps he might have ordered her out. And that would have broken the heart of Thompson, and have deprived him of the chance to make a most telling contribution to the coming battle.

As soon as the English line was formed and the men sent to their stations, there was nothing to do but wait. As silent as death-angels, the great, black-hulled ships of the English fleet, swept down upon the parti-colored line of their ancient enemy.

At two o'clock that afternoon, a man on the crosstrees of L'Heureux—a sailor, engaged in overhauling some of the rigging—happened to cast his eyes over the sandbank to the westward. What was his astonishment to see, outlined against the sloping sun, the top-sails of a fleet of ships! He reported his discovery to the deck at once, and in a few moments the rigging and mast-heads of the French fleet swarmed with men scanning the strangers.

It was immediately realized that the twelve sail approaching them, for the Swiftsure and Alexander were not in sight at the time, composed the fleet of Admiral Nelson. That the French were surprised by their arrival, is to put it mildly. Brueys seemed to have entertained the fatuous belief that the English were afraid of him! He knew very well that in the matter of size and strength, his own fleet greatly over-matched Nelson's. L'Orient was considered more than capable of taking care of two 74's. The three 80's were estimated as a heavy overmatch of five 74's. This calculation would leave him with nine 74's as against four of the same and one fifty, to the English, counting their number as twelve, or seven, counting their number as fourteen. The odds were so overwhelmingly in his favor, that he was sure that under no circumstances would Nelson dare to assume the offensive; especially as the French lookouts only counted twelve sail-of-the-line. Brueys was as brave as a lion, and as stupid as he was brave.

The Bay of Aboukir is shaped like a fish-hook, Bequière Island, now called Nelson's Island, being the point of the barb. Inside this barb, the French ships were anchored in a line forming a very obtuse angle, L'Orient at the apex. They were distant from one another about four hundred feet. Bonaparte's emphatic words concerning the possibility of his flanks being turned, had roused Brueys into some sort of sluggish action. He had erected the battery of Bequière Island, and had massed some of his gunboats and bomb ketches in the shallow water inside his van ship, La Guerrier.

As has been said, the water of the Bay of Aboukir is very shoal, and the French line was of necessity formed about three miles from the shore, in between five and six fathoms of water. About a thousand feet inside the line, four heavy frigates had been stationed. Unfortunately for the French, the best and most efficient ships—outside the powerful trio which formed the centre—L'Orient, 120; Le Franklin, 60, just ahead of her; and Le Tonnant, 80, right astern, had been placed in the rear division, with Admiral Villeneuve flying his flag on Le Guillaume Tell, another splendid eighty-gun ship.

When the English were discovered, large detachments from all the French ships were ashore, filling water casks. Signals were immediately made to recall these parties, and the captains of the French fleet were summoned aboard the flag. There was division and indecision in the council that ensued.

"What's this news you bring?"

extended a long distance to the eastward of the little island. Therefore the English ships gave it a wide berth, after they weathered it, before they swung to the southward. On every vessel leadmen in the chains kept the commanders informed of the state of the water. It was not until five o'clock that they deemed it safe to head direct for the French fleet in line parallel to the shore. Ship after ship swung around past the island, and in a pell-mell huddle—for no attempt had been made to preserve any especial order during the last few hours of the chase—they squared away for the French line, setting their topgallant sails as they did so. Nelson, however, did not intend that the attack should be delivered in the confusion in which the varying rates of speed had temporarily thrown the several ships of the fleet.

Presently the signal, "Prepare for battle!" was given. Instantly could be heard the rattle of drums from ship to ship, calling the men to their quarters. In a few moments this signal was followed by another. Everybody on the fleet knew what the signal would be. Everybody was ready to obey it. The order was to form line ahead and stern of the Vanguard, as most convenient.

THE BOY WE CROWN

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

JESUS, when about to return to heaven, said to his Apostles, "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you." This saying was probably suggested by the rooms for the priests, which were in three tiers over against his Father's house, the Temple. The Apostles had often seen these rooms, and knew all about the comfort and protection which they afforded the priests, and so were prepared to appreciate the prospect of places prepared for them in Heaven by Jesus.

Jehoiada was high-priest in the time of the prophet Elisha. One or more of these priests' rooms was, for the space of six years, used by him in the most interesting way. His wife, Jehosheba, brought a child there, one year old, and kept him there hidden for six years. Jehosheba had rescued the child from a heap of corpses, the bodies of his brothers, who had been slain by their grandmother, Athaliah, in order that she might reign upon the throne of Israel. Jehosheba had discovered the living child among the dead, for the slain ones being her nephews, she had gone out to view the result of the dreadful massacre. She had heard the feeble cry of an infant child, wounded, but not dead, and she gathered him in her arms and fled. Her find must be kept a secret, or the child's life would be taken by Queen Athaliah. Where could she hide him? There was no place so secluded as the rooms of the priests in the Court of the Temple. How strange that it should be so? It was because the Temple had fallen almost into disuse, for a Temple for Baal had been erected by Athaliah, in Jerusalem, and the people went there to worship the idol god, rather than to Solomon's temple, to worship the true God. We can picture in our minds, the little one growing up under the care of the nurse provided by Aunt Jehosheba, and playing unhindered among the partial ruins of the Temple. It was a new version of the Psalm, "The sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest, even thine altars."

"Uncle Jehoiada" had great thoughts of heart for the boy, Joash, now seven years of age. He determined through him to re-establish the worship of Jehovah. It was a project worthy of the High Priest. He had the right to summon guards to protect the Temple. And when they were come, he brought out the child Joash, and declared him the rightful sovereign of Judah. He bound them to secrecy until the Sabbath, when they should come again to the Temple, to defend the child, when he should be proclaimed king. They came on the day appointed, and were stationed so as to completely surround the Temple. Jehoiada placed special weapons in their hands, the spears and shields of King David, which he brought out of the Temple. Then Jehoiada stood the boy Joash in their midst, and put the crown of Judah upon his head, and anointed and proclaimed him king. The guards clapped their hands and shouted, "God save the king," and loud trumpets were blown. And, strange sight, the idolatrous queen Athaliah was seen coming into the Temple of God, but not as a worshiper—not she! Her errand was one of investigation. "What's the cause of all this loud noise?" She saw the boy king standing between the two great pillars of the Temple, where kings were wont to be crowned, and in his hands was the roll of the Law of God, which, as a part of the coronation ceremony, he had promised to keep and defend. Athaliah shouted, "Treason, treason," but none rallied to her standard. Instead, the guard would have slain her in the Temple. But Jehoiada would not have the house of God defiled, and so he commanded that she should be taken beyond it. She was forced out as far as the king's stables and slain there. So perished the wicked daughter of Ahab and Jezebel.

Illustration and Application

1. A Cruel Grandmother. Artists delight to paint a child's young face beside the wrinkled but loving face of his fond grandmother. But in this story we have a child's pure face contrasted with the cruel face of a grandmother, who had murdered all his brothers, and supposed she had murdered him also. This Athaliah is the Lady Macbeth of the Bible, driven by ambition to murder; a "Bloody Mary" also, for her crime was probably in part due to her determination to exterminate the worship of Jehovah, and substitute the worship of Baal and Astarte. She was the daughter of Jezebel, the foreign, idolatrous wife of Ahab. Athaliah made trouble in Judah for three generations, being first the evil counselor of her royal husband, Jotham, then of her royal son, Ahaziah, then the murderer of his children—all of which came from good King Jehoshaphat's one great mistake of forming an alliance with the wicked Ahab, King of Israel, whose marriage with the heathen Jezebel had been the curse of the upper kingdom also—a warning against all partnerships with evil persons, especially in marriage, by which we may curse a family or a nation to the third or fourth generation. God says, "Come out from among them and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you."

2. A Faithful Aunt. Jehosheba, daughter of Athaliah, and wife of Jehoiada, the chief priest, was the good daughter of a bad mother, whose plot to kill her grandchildren she partly foiled. Having rescued the youngest of her nephews from the murderous plot, she hid him six years, at the risk of her own life. That the daughter of a weak father and cruel mother could become so brave and kind a woman, is an encouragement for those who know they have a bad heredity. The grace of God is stronger than blood. Though the chief lesson of this story is for boys, in faithful Jehosheba there is a sweet lesson for girls who have come up in unfavorable surroundings. I know of a Christian family of wealth, in which the children are all living for Christ. One of them founded a rescue mission, which has won from drunkenness and vice many a wandering wreck of humanity. The secret has been learned from the mother. When her children grow old enough to decide for themselves, she places before them two courses: "Here is the course of pleasure-seeking, of selfishness. You may spend your money in dressing, on the theatre and entertainments, and you will have some pleasure. But here is another course of self-sacrifice, of separation unto God, of striving to please Christ by ministering unto others. While the former course may give you pleasure, this will give you greater joy, and will end in glory." One of the daughters, when she came where the two ways met, had days of struggle. She spent one whole night in prayer, and next morning kissed her mother and said: "The victory is won. I have decided for

The following story from Japan has been published under the appropriate title, "The Word of God is not Bound." A young Japanese Christian was imprisoned at Tokio for free expression of his liberal sentiments. He labored successfully for the conversion of a fellow-prisoner. Others gathered to hear him, till he had a congregation of earnest listeners. At his liberation, he informed the authorities of the miserable condition of the prisoners, and appointed governor of a new prison, with permission to teach and practice the doctrines of Christianity.

So the hiding of Joash, caused by persecution, became providence, for it kept him in a faithful minister's family for those first six years of life when character is formed; whereas, if he had been kept in the palace with its evil influences, his inner life might have been destroyed. God's promises and providences can not be defeated. "The Word of God shall stand forever." For seven years of Athaliah's reign may have seemed to some that God had forgotten his promise and his people. At such hours we need to remember that "God does not pay at the end of every week, but at the end he pays."

Every boy's life is a plan of God, and every boy is destined for a crown, which no one can cast away but himself. A crown of true success in this world, and a crown of glory in the world beyond. All the earth has been interested in the recent birth of an heir to the crown of all Russias; but all the heavens are as much interested in the birth of every child, for every one is to have crowns on earth and in heaven, if he will be faithful. What sort of a boy is it that we delight to honor? Who is it that we crown in school, and in business, and in manly sports? Is it the cigarette fiend, who loafs on the corners, and makes insulting remarks at passing girls, and cheats in his lessons, and shirks his work? Little James was one day sent with a pitcher for some water. He accidentally dropped the pitcher and broke it, and as it was a valuable one, he felt very about it. As he stood looking sadly at the broken pieces, another boy came along, and inquired what was the matter. James told him, and he said: "Well, go home and tell your mother that a boy threw a stone at you, and broke a pitcher." "No, I shall go home and tell mother that I dropped it and broke it." "But you surely get whipped if you do. I will think that you were careless." "I don't care if I do get whipped. I shall tell the truth. I would rather take a thousand whippings than tell a lie to my mother."

Every man, young or old, applying for employment in the Bank of England, is presented with a list of twenty questions to answer, the first on the list is, "How do you spend your Sundays?" This may account for the minimum of delinquencies in that solid institution. The boys that win are those whose word can be relied upon, who spend their Sundays quietly at home in church, and are iron-clad in their lips, against the first taste of liquor in their ears, against impure words in their hands, against wrong doing in their feet against going to bad company; in their eyes, against dangerous books and pictures; in their pockets, against dishonest money; in their tongues, against evil speaking.

The law of God, that was placed like a sword and shield in the hands of the little King Joash, God's own will also for his enrichment in character, reminds us of the story of two children, a boy and a girl, whose rich grandfather, a very different character from Athaliah, had adopted them as his own, and taken them to live in his home, and had made a will, which he gave all his property to them. But when the grandfather died suddenly, the lawyer who had drawn the will searched for it in vain. Two nearer relations, who had been cut out for good reasons in the will, ordered the children to leave the mansion. The last day they were to be in the house the children renewed most earnestly the search for the lost will. "Grandfather told me in this room," said the boy to his sister, "that he had provided for us, and that the will was close at hand." After others went to sleep the children kept up the search into the night, looking behind every picture, trying every part of the wall. At last they touched a place where the panel gave way, a sliding door rolled back, and there was the will that gave them the mansion and great riches. Not thus must our children search long and anxiously to find God's will, by which they are given "Mansions in heaven and rich joys on earth. God's will lies at hand where none can fail to see it."

As this is the Sunday before election, it is a good time to recall incidents of our Christian rulers, especially of the childhood. There was a famous grammar school in Philadelphia, to which the boys of well-to-do parents were sent to be trained in "the humanities." The examinations were severe, and the lads who failed, felt themselves somewhat disgraced in the eyes of the whole town. Many of the pupils secretly used translations, or were helped by friends in their studies. There is a tradition that one boy, Charles Thompson, refused to avail himself of any help or dishonest trick. He was slow to learn, and timid. His classmates insisted that he appeared at an unjust disadvantage for these reasons at examinations, and urged him to use "ponies" and "cribs." "No," he said, "it is a pity if I do not learn Greek, but it is worse if I learn to lie."

CORONATION OF THE YOUNG KING WITNESSED BY HIS GRANDMOTHER

Christ and his service." The story of Jehosheba, as a good aunt, recalls a recent case where a boy, deserted by his father and mother when he was five years old, was brought up tenderly by his uncle. When he came to be a man, he asked a court to change his name to that of his uncle, and make him the adopted son of the faithful uncle. And it was done.

3. A Brave Minister. Jehoiada is an inspiring example of the courage ministers have often shown in trying times. Of course, he knew that Athaliah would kill him if she knew he was hiding an heir to the throne she had won by murder. When the time came, how like a general he marshaled the priests and the Levites, who surrounded the boy to protect him against his foes. Picture of what should be done everywhere; compass the imperiled boy round about with watchful parents, and teachers, and pastors, to save him from worse foes than Athaliah, who could only kill the body, while enemies that kill the soul threaten our boys every day.

4. A Boy of Destiny. What intense interest the godly people felt in the royal boy, the true heir of Judah's crown and of God's promise. God had promised David that his royal line should never perish. Athaliah could hardly have been so many years in Judah's royal palace and not know of this great promise. But she thought she could kill God's promise. In the end she only brought on her own death at the stables, recalling her mother's ignoble death, eaten by dogs. A negro clergyman, from a cannibal tribe in West Africa, related some particulars of his early life, when a lady asked him what most impressed him in the Bible. "The story of Jezebel," he answered. "You know we are told the dogs did not touch the palms of her hands. Well, that convinced me of the truth of the narrative, for we never eat the palms of the hands in my country, they are too bitter."

THE WIFE

Who is Most Tenderly Loved

By Margaret E. Sangster

IN one of the monthly magazines a serial story is running, which has for its chief motive the marriage of a certain capricious and impulsive little lady, to a very dignified and well-balanced man, a Member of Parliament, and one of the gifted leaders of the nation. Lady Kitty, his wife, is a spoiled child, and nothing more. She is inconsiderate, ill-trained and unconventional. The whim of the moment is her law, and her husband, far from losing patience with her, is a model of devotion, loving her the more, the more she could drive any other man to distraction.

Around the open fire the other evening a group of women were discussing this situation. Three were married, two were single. A solitary man in the room was absorbed in an evening paper; but he occasionally looked up and smiled as he heard their animated voices, and once in a while he put in a word.

"Depend upon it, my dears," said Mrs. Placide, the oldest of the ladies, "that story is the offspring of a novelist's fancy. A husband does not continue a lover if he is constantly made uncomfortable. Men have a noted aversion to scenes. They want an atmosphere of serenity in the home, to pay them for the trouble and care they have outside, and they have not patient endurance to bestow on an inefficient and tempestuous woman, who is not good and even-tempered wife. Mr. Placide, bless his heart, is the very best of men; but what would he or I have done if I had behaved like that Lady Kitty?"

Looking at Mrs. Placide, two hundred pounds weight, matronly, silver-haired, and sweet to the core, nobody would for an instant compare her with a butterfly creature who was made up of dew and dew. A smile went round the company.

"I agree with you, Mrs. Placide," said Es. Ranger, "that most men enjoy comfort in a domestic life. But don't you think there is a kind of dead level of ease, that is very different from what a young man anticipates when she stands in her bridal robes and gives her pledge to the lover at her side? All through courtship she has had the most absolute worship, the most romantic devotion; gifts, flowers, fruit, compliments, have been her portion. After she is married these gradually cease. John Ranger is a good husband, but he never remembers a wedding anniversary, and he seldom knows what I have on. I could wear an old bonnet that looked as if it had been in the ark, and John would be none the wiser, not he. Nice clothes are wasted on him."

Mrs. Sherwood, a modest little woman in Quaker garb, now gently spoke.

"There is wrong, Martha; there is wrong. What men need is to be kept interested, surprised, not to be quite sure what is coming next. There may take it for granted that the wife who can interest will never lose her husband's worshipful regard."

"What do you say?" The question was addressed by Mrs. Placide to a quiet woman in sombre dress, her face sad, her manner composed, as of one who had seen and felt much in the course of her life.

"Well," replied Mrs. Knight, "as you have challenged me so directly I will state my belief. In so big and so vital a question, it is impossible to answer anything in an arbitrary way. But as I have noticed in my large circle of acquaintance, the wives who accept devotion rather than outpour it, retain their husband's admiration longest. I do not say they are better loved than others, but a wife who allows herself to be waited on, whose moods cannot be counted on, who, in a word, assumes queenly prerogatives, is more considered than a wife who spends her whole time and thought in running on John's errands, and coddling John on every occasion."

Then, interpolated the solitary man, "you don't think the little Lady Kitty in danger of worrying her husband's love out; of losing it, in short? I am a bachelor, so I don't know, but my idea of a wife is somebody who would have my slippers ready at night, my dinner done to a turn, and who would never rub me the wrong way. I could adore that sort of wife, if I could find her!"

"You are very frank," said Emily Chester, one of the girls.

"Yes," said Katherine Leonard, the other, "I believe you reflect the views of your sex. But I shall never marry until I find a man who will want to of this world creep in, and sentiment is buried beneath them. And then, some people are incompatible by nature. When this happens, there must be a great self-sacrificing love on one side or the other, or else they will suffer shipwreck."

"The truth is," said the little Quakeress, "that the words of Jesus stand sure forever. 'He that saveth his life shall lose it.' In home life, there must be constant forbearance on each side. If we would get on smoothly with anybody, we must yield our own wishes at times. Even the little headstrong Lady Kitty did that now and then."

"Yes," said the man, "when her husband managed her aright."

At this there was a general protest, every woman declaring that managing on the part of a man could not be borne. In the midst of the hubbub, a maid created a diversion by bringing in a tray on which were sandwiches piled high, and nuts and apples. The lady of the house hurried off to see that coffee would be ready directly, and the talk came to an end.

But thinking it over afterward, one of the group arrived at the conclusion that although it may seem happy, there is not much real happiness in the union of those whose lives are an alternation of perpetual storms and subsequent calms. One wants in marriage rest for the heart and soul. Of all relations it is the most intimate and the most confidential. Husbands and wives see one another with very clear and candid eyes. The love they have for each other does not require exploiting; it is not ruffled easily, nor is it in any peril, because it is not talked about. The whole of it is in the Book of Proverbs, where it is said of the good woman, "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her."

There are plenty of happy marriages. They are found in every town, every farming neighborhood, and every city street. Far do they outnumber the opposite. Only those who are obstinately pessimistic fear that married happiness is out of date.

And as for the bachelors and the maidens who cling to single blessedness, they know not what of joy, of opportunity and of earthly blessedness they lose.

Is not the wife most tenderly loved, the one who, through the changeable years, most tenderly loves her good man? Does not love respond to love? But tender love must not, mind you, be abject love.

A SPARKLING DRAUGHT

Cool and clear the water drips, sweet as nectar to the lips.
Birds may sip its crystal draught. Never thirsty maiden quaffed Anything so pure as this. Mary tastes it—here is bliss!
Dropping, dripping, cool and clear; just the same the whole round year.

Spinsters with No Chance

Ungallant as it seems to say so, there are lovely women in this land of ours who are old maids, because, where they dwell, there are not enough husbands to go round. From many beautiful hamlets in New England, even from thriving villages in the Middle West, places that have an air of prosperous life, the young and marriageable men have departed. Men seek the larger opportunities of the great cities, or they go to the frontiers, or to South America, or South Africa, or the Philippines, or the Far East. They refuse to stay at home, where there is no chance to make a fortune. The girls stay at home, and grow softly and serenely into the gentle tranquillity of spinsterhood; they are not wives, because no man is there to ask them.

Other girls, as ambitious as their brothers, are bent on a career, and they, too, are spinsters who, in a way, have no choice. For after a little, the man who sees a girl day after day, working in an office just as he does, feels in her his competitor or his rival, recognizes in her a force that helps to keep him back from his goal, does not want to marry that girl. He is much more likely to fall in love with another, who is fair as the lily, who dresses beautifully and has no care to pull her down, and who may, or may not, make him an excellent wife.

For, we must admit that often the pretty butterfly of girlhood turns into something very sweet and surprisingly useful and fine in her later life. Married to a man she loves, she develops the good qualities of true womanhood. If only all the bachelors who are selfishly avoiding matrimony, and of whom there are too many, would set themselves to courting the spinsters who could make them happy, what a forward march there might be in our civilization.

A Negro Poet Passing Away

PAUL LAWRENCE DUNBAR, whose poems of negro life and character have delighted thousands of readers, white and black, is believed to be dying. He is a victim of consumption, and the gifted pen which, in both song and story, has given pleasure to so many, will, in all probability, write no more.

It is not because he was black, nor be-the author of some of the finest so-called negro dialect poems, Paul was an elevator boy in one of New York's uptown apartment hotels. Here at this time W. D. Howells was living, and in going up and down in the elevator, he noticed that the boy—no different in appearance from hundreds of others to be found in similar positions—was often industriously scribbling on bits of paper. Mr. Howells, moved by curiosity, once asked Paul what he was doing. "Just writing," was the reply. Having gained the scribe's consent to look over the writing, Mr. Howells made a discovery. Here was a negro who had studied his race, objectively, and who had represented the negro as he found him to be, with humor, with sympathy, and yet with entire truthfulness. With a refined and delicate art, the poet, in his dialect pieces, describes the range of emotion, and reveals in these a fine perception of the negro's present limitation, but he does this with rare tenderness, tintured at times with good-natured irony.

In the short poem, beginning:

Not they who soar, but they who plod
Their rugged way, unhelped, to God, are heroes,
there is boundless sympathy and encouragement for the lowly toiler.

The poet's own feeling regarding his work—a sentiment shared by the average author in estimating his own work—may be gathered from the following lines:

He sang of life, serenely sweet,
With now and then a deeper note,
From some high peak, nigh, yet remote,
He voiced the world's absorbing heat.

He sang of love, when earth was young,
And love itself was in his lays.
But oh, the world, it turned to praise,
A jingle in a broken tongue.

However, Mr. Dunbar is undoubtedly at his best in his "Lyrics of Lowly Life." Underneath the smile, there is often a sob, while happy, innocent laughter chases the tear away. The bereaved mother-heart speaks in, "Two Little Boots," and no less in the cry:

Lias! Lias! Bless the Lawd!
Don' you know de day's erbroad?
Ef you don' git up, you scamp,
Dey'll be trouble in dis camp.

All who have read and been moved to alternate laughter and tears by the poet's verse, will grieve to know that his days are numbered, that he has not long to live. In view of this, one cannot but recall his exquisite poem:

W'EN I GITS HOME

It's moughty tiahsome layin' 'roun'
Dis sorrer-laden earfly groun',
An' oftentimes I thinks, thinks I,
'Twould be a sweet t'ing des to die,
An' go 'long home.

Home whaih de frien's I loved 'll say,
'We've waited fu' you many a day,
Come hyeah an' res' yo'se'f, an know
You 's done wid sorrer an' wid woe,
Now you 's at home.

I wish de day was neah at han',
I 's tiahed of dis grievin' lan',
I 's tiahed of de lonely yeahs,
I want to des dry up my teahs,
An' go 'long home.

Oh, Mastah, won't you sen' de call?
My frien's is daih, my hope, my all.
I 's waitin' whaih de road is rough,
I want to hyeah you say, "Enough,
Ol' man, come home!"

Mr. Dunbar's prose works have fine value, and have brought his name into prominence. He is the author of five volumes of prose entitled, The Fanatics, Folks from Dixie, The Uncalled, The Strength of Gideon and The Love of Landry.

PAUL LAWRENCE DUNBAR

cause his father and mother were slaves, that the poems of Paul Lawrence Dunbar are read with such widespread appreciation. It is because the note of his song rings true; true to nature and the writer's higher sentiments and feelings. The author's race, origin, and condition do not enter into the question of the merit of his productions. Genius is genius, and a poet's a poet, be his skin white, black or yellow.

There is no admixture of white blood in Mr. Dunbar. His father was a slave, who escaped to Canada before the emancipation, which freed his mother. He was born in Dayton, Ohio, where his parents had settled, and the child had no greater advantages of education or mind development than his humble station in life supplied. His father taught him to read, but it would seem that the spirit of poetry in the boy was a heritage from the mother, who shared his passion and love of literature. His first attempts she valued, and with a proud heart saw that they were received with praise among the people who read them in his home town.

Most readers prefer Mr. Dunbar's poems illustrative of his own race, their emotions, and characteristic phases of their lives; but many of his pieces in good literary English are received as valued additions to a not over-stocked market. The poem entitled, "The Wind and the Sea," is full of as delicate imagery as one finds in many a product of a master poet-mind:

The wind was young and the sea was old,
But their cries went up together;
The wind was warm, but the sea was cold,
For age makes wintry weather.

So they cried aloud, and wept amain,
'Till the sky grew dark to hear it;
And out of its folds crept the misty rain,
In its shroud, like a troubled spirit.

For the wind was wild with a hopeless love
And the sea was sad at heart,
At many a time he wot of,
Wherein he had played his part.

for a "Prison Gate Mission"

A Movement to Help Discharged Prisoners to Lead Honest and Useful Christian Lives

ONE of the most perplexing questions of to-day is how to intelligently reach the man just out of prison, and help him by some practical means to get on his feet again. Every year, thousands of men and women are discharged from our jails and reformatories only to return to crime after a brief intermission. Indeed, from fifty to sixty per cent. of all first offenders, who have passed one term in prison, return again, because of the inadequacy of the means set on foot to aid them to find employment and the want of a sympathetic friend to direct their future.

There is no question that a majority of the men who pass through the prison go into liberty, cherish the best intention to reform and begin life anew. But they are handicapped from the start. It is difficult to find work, and even when they have secured employment, the employer learns of his past, he usually discharges him. Society, as it exists, is against him; old friends give him a cold shoulder, and the police watch his movements continually. Some drift back to prison again; others end their days in the waters of the river.

A Chaplain of the Gospel Mission to New York Tombs, I have been working for several years to help in the social and industrial rehabilitation of men who have just come out of prison. I meet them at the prison-gate as soon as they are discharged; I take them aside and counsel them quietly, giving them a copy of John's Gospel, and warning them against the saloon and other temptations. Then I urge them to accept Christ as their personal Saviour. If they are hungry and homeless, I procure them food and a bed for that night at the Salvation Army hotel, which is one of the best of the cheap lodging-houses. I have found employment for many of them, and have directed others to persons in the city who employ unskilled laborers. In many cases many men who would otherwise have returned to crime after coming out of prison, have been helped and encouraged to make the effort for a law-abiding and decent life.

Six years ago, when I first began my work, I labored with a man who had been in prison about twenty years. Six years ago his convictions had been recorded against him. After his release, he had made many efforts to reform, but respectable people shunned him as a hopeless case. I listened long to the sad story of his life as he whispered it into my ears through the iron bars of his cell. It was exceedingly pathetic. He told me, with a strong voice, of the many efforts he had made to reform, only to slip back again to crime, as nobody would employ or help him on account of his past. Time and again he had begged men to give him something to do to save him from going back to prison, but they refused. On one occasion, when he had secured employment driving a street car, his heart filled with hope; but in an evil moment some one told the foreman about his record and he was discharged at once. I went to Judge James A. Blanchard, of the Court of General Sessions, and told him of the peculiar case. He suspended sentence, and after the man's release I succeeded in procuring him employment. He has now been living a reputable and straight-forward life for more than five years. Since that incident I have dedicated my life to God to work among this sad and neglected class. At Northfield, a few years ago, I called on the Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London. He told me that while he was pastor at Leicester, between 1880 and 1890, he established a Prison Gate Mission. He urged me to secure a place at once, where I could meet the released men face to face, and direct their future life.

The prisons of Greater New York alone have discharged over twenty thousand prisoners last year. What became of all these men and women? It is needless to say a large number of them were drawn back to crime again, although the existence of a Prison Gate Mission might have been the means, under God, of rescuing hundreds, if not thousands, and of restoring them to decent lives.

It would be interesting to narrate some of the experiences I have met at the prison-gate, but space forbids that. When I have tried to instill hope into the heart of a forlorn ex-prisoner, he replied, "It is too late for me; nobody wants me now." Another said, "If anyone had offered to help me ten years ago, I'd be a different man to-day." A young woman coming out of the penitentiary said, "Where shall I turn? I haven't a friend in the world." Others have said, "Chaplain, I'd like you get me work; I have no home but the saloon, and I don't want to go there."

With the aid of friends of the work, the Prison-Gate Mission of New York, the first of its kind on this Continent, has now been established. It is in the best sense a Samaritan work of kindness and sympathy for a class that is now practically neglected. "I was sick and in prison and ye visited me," were the Saviour's approving words to the faithful ones, who had practical sympathy for the prisoner. Should our good offices in his behalf cease with his liberation, at the very moment he stands most in greatest need of a helping hand and kindly counsel? Should we not rather try by every means in our power to bring him into a right attitude toward his Maker and his fellow-man and to give him an opportunity to earn an honest living? This, in brief, is the task of the Prison-Gate Mission. It asks the co-operation of God's people everywhere—those who have an ever-open ear to the cry of the distressed and the unfortunate.

Arrangements are now being made for a central headquarters for the Prison Gate Mission in New York, where the cases will be received and dealt with, and where all applications for labor will receive prompt attention. The following gentlemen have written to me, cordially endorsing the Prison Gate Mission, and expressing the warmest approval of the effort to help the ex-prisoners to become honest and self-supporting Christian men and women:

George B. McClellan, Esq., Mayor of New York; William McAdoo, Esq., Commissioner of Police, New York; Hon. Chas. H. Knox, New York; G. H. Sandison, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; the Hon. James A. Mayo, Tombs Prison Police Court; Rev. Dr. Charles L. Thompson of the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions; Z. R. Brockway, ex-superintendent of Elmira Reformatory; Dr. F. W. Robertson, ex-superintendent, Elmira Reformatory; Judge Martin T. McMahon, General Sessions, New York.

The following have consented to act as an Advisory Board:

Dr. F. W. Robertson, Ex-President of Elmira Reformatory; John Willis Baer, Secretary Home Mission Board; George H. Sandison, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; Dr. John Bancroft Devens, editor of New York Observer; Henry D. Dickson, Secretary Twenty-third Street Y. M. C. A.; Jacob A. Riis; Andrew A. Knowles, Esq., banker, Treasurer.

Mr. Knowles is Third Vice-President of the Mechanics' National Bank, 33 Wall Street, New York City, and will receive and acknowledge all contributions for the work of the Mission.

B. N. McD., Princeton, N. J. The famine in Finland, Sweden and Norway occurred in 1903, two years after President McKinley's death. You probably have in mind President McKinley's contribution of $100 to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD China Famine Fund. It was President Roosevelt who sent us a check for $100, to be used for the relief of suffering in Finland, Norway and Sweden. You are right as to the President of the United States having given practical expression to his sympathy with the sufferers in the Northlands, but you are in error as to the name.

High School Boy, Lynn, Mass. Will you please explain the meaning of the phrase "Black Friday," and how it originated?

There are two English Black Fridays, so-called, because on that day of the week, news reached London that the young Pretender, Charles Edward, had arrived at Derby. The second was on account of a great financial disaster and ruin, which followed the failure of Overend, Gurney & Co., London. The American Black Friday was Sept. 24, 1869, when speculators attempted to create a corner

Mrs. H., Wyoming, Ill. What is the meaning of Mark 10: 31: "Many that are first shall be last and the last first?"

It is that many who are foremost in the world's estimation will be of little account in the next life, and that many who are poor and humble and oppressed here, or who are working for their fellow-men without vainglory or ostentation, will be appreciated at their true worth hereafter. In other words, that simple faith and sincerity, supported by kind deeds, far outweigh in the Divine estimation worldly titles, honors and applause.

WASHINGTON'S FRIEND AND ADVISER HONORED.

THE MONUMENT TO GENERAL POOR UNVEILED AT HACKENSACK, N. J.

FOR more than a century, the remains of Brigadier-General Enoch Poor, the trusted friend and adviser of General Washington, and a worthy officer of the Continental Army, have lain in the little cemetery of the "Old First Church," at Hackensack, N. J. On October 7, the memory and patriotic services of this distinguished hero of early revolutionary days, received long-delayed recognition by the unveiling of a memorial shaft and statue, the work of the sculptor Piatti, and the gift of the New Jersey Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, to Hackensack. Enoch Poor was the son of humble parents, and was a cabinet-maker in early life. He served in the patriot army with great distinction. He was in many battles, and his command bore the brunt of the engagement at Saratoga, when Burgoyne surrendered. He endured the terrible privations of Valley Forge, and was noted for his kindness to his soldiers. He took a conspicuous part in the battle of Monmouth. He died of fever, September 8, 1780, aged 44. At that time he was a member of General Washington's council. There was a great gathering at the unveiling of the monument, and the pageant, civic and military, was a memorable one. Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, pastor of the Calvary Baptist Church, Hackensack, and Secretary of the Bergen County Historical Society, accepted the site on behalf of the civil authorities. In the course of his address he said:

On this village green rested the army of the nation, when, led by Washington, the patriots retreated in 1776 from Fort Lee across New Jersey. In yonder brown stone mansion house slept the Father of our Country during that great struggle for liberty, and here gathered together upon this sacred common the soldiers of the American Revolution for a military funeral, when they were compelled to bury the hero whose memory the Sons of the American Revolution honor this day.

The monument stands within a stone's throw of General Poor's grave in the cemetery.

N. E. P. Tampico, Mex. Who is the author of the expression, "Like oil poured upon the troubled waves?" Where can the expression be found?

It doubtless originated in a desire to paraphrase the famous adage in Proverbs 15: 1, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." The origin of the employment of oil to quiet the stormy waves is very old. It is still resorted to occasionally, even in modern times.

Reader, Middletown, N. Y. I believe that if we are converted, and have love enough for Christ, we will have no desire for worldly pleasures. When trying to show this to others, they tell me there's a time to dance, and that the Bible says so.

In the times before the Christian era, dancing was, with some nations, a religious ceremonial; with others it was an accompaniment to a carousal. In Ecclesiastes (3 chapter), the writer, speaking of the vanity of all human experiences, says, among other things,

E. T., Dayton, O. The art that is fitted for the studio is not always of a character to me approval in public. What might be alt ether proper in the one, as studies of the human body, would be quite out of place in the ther. This appears to be the only reason-able explanation.

J. Rahway, N. J. What is the best book to read at the cost of war?

In Bloch's volume entitled The Future of War, is by far the best. European and American wars from 1790 to 1880 (90 years) cost 1,000 lives and $15,235,000,000 of property. G. & Co. are the publishers. The total cost of the American Civil War, it is said, would have sufficed to build five cities of the size of Boston.

M. Morrison, Ill. In your opinion does the saying, "He that would thrive must rise at the dawn," apply to ministers the same as farmers business men and women?

I would depend altogether on the necessity of the case. When the old "saw" you have quoted was written, employments were less varied than to-day. What might suit a farmer might not be at all fit for a professional man, whose labors may take him far into the night. Modern scientists rather disprove the old saying, and some have even expressed the opinion that too early rising is injurious to brain and body alike.

C., Copenhagen, N. Y. In your last week's paper, C. P. Andrews asks who wrote the prayer beginning "Now I lay me down to sleep?" As the author we know not, but as generally it is a prayer? Should it not be addressed to the Lord in the second person instead of the first, as follows—

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake,
I pray Thee, Lord, my soul to take."

It is primarily intended as a simple prayer for childhood—such a petition as infant lips can repeat understandingly. We have seen, however, of grown men and women in moments of severe mental trial, found themselves incapable of framing a prayer, and were wonderfully helped by this simple petition.

H., Chelsea, Mich. In our Sunday School there arose the question, Did the people the prophets before Christ ever call upon God as their Father, or "Our Father"? Even a preacher seemed not to be informed about it. S. Psalms 89: 26, and 103: 13; Isa. 9: 6, 3: 64; 8: 1 Chron. 17: 13, 22: 10, 28: 6; and the passages. It is evident that the Divine Fatherhood was recognized, in Israel at as far from the earliest times, and it is quite probable that this recognition was embodied in prayers and religious ceremonies of the ton, N. Y. Why do people in the churches, calling themselves Christians, refuse to associate with the common people who are respectable? I belonged to a church here eight years, I left because, though I longed for company, people who knew me would not as much as I. I needed encouragement to help me through the strait path, but just because one was not as handsome or does not dress as well as they do, they frown on you. I ask these people, how are they going to avoid speaking such as I when they arrive in heaven? Or, they so much better that God will protect them from view? The Bible teaches us to love another, but if they are ashamed even to speak to a common person here, one or the other will have to go to hell. I believe there are not ten Christians in a hundred that God would pronounce as such to-day. If ever one lived to live right, I did in those years I was a church member; but not one encouraging word I get. The Christians acted as though they were ashamed of me. I have left them, and am as one with no hopes. I am a cashier. If I am not good enough to go into my house, surely I will not be noticed in heaven.

Yrs, unfortunately, is not a solitary experience. In every age and land there have been Scribes and Pharisees," and the selfish and exclusive so-called Christians, who you met and who held aloof, are more pitied than condemned. Having the same they lack the spirit of Christ and the love of his. But in that very church (in every church), had you made your wish for Christian companionship known, you could have found true followers of Jesus who would have been to you all that you could ask; not in the leading places, probably out among the humblest of the worshipers. The Gospel is not left without witnesses in any community. It is probably natural that you should feel keenly the results of your experience; but even that is not a valid reason for condemning your church. In doing this you do your own highest interests a great injustice. We advise you to resume church relations somewhere, search out the true Christians, whose love and sympathy will be most helpful to you, and pray that you may be enabled, with help from on high, to do your duty steadfastly, and to backslide no more.

C. L. R., Sandusky, O. Will THE MAIL-BAG please tell how many Christian Russian churches there are in New York City, and where they are?

There are two—the Church of the Holy Trinity, in East Twenty-seventh Street, and the Church of St. Nicholas, in East Ninety-seventh Street. In Greenwich Street, there is a Greek Catholic Church of St. Joseph, belonging to the Maronite branch of the Roman Catholic Church. In Brooklyn, there is the Russian orthodox church of St. Nicholas; this church is located in Pacific Street.

B. H., Chester, Pa. 1. By what right did Russia occupy Korea and Manchuria? 2. Korea is an independent country, and Manchuria belongs to China, does it not? 3. Would the fall of Port Arthur end the war in favor of Japan?

1. Russia occupied Manchuria by virtue of a lease from China, granted under pressure, which amounted to coercion. She occupied a portion of Korea by virtue of timber concessions on the Yalu, obtained from the Korean Government. 2. Yes, 3. Not necessarily, but it would greatly strengthen Japan's hold upon the Liao-tung peninsula.

J. K. E., Kinderhook, Ill. Will you kindly give a description of the "Beautiful Gate" referred to in Acts 3: 2?

This gate was at the entrance to the Court of Women, immediately opposite the Gate of Shushan, the eastern portal, through the outer wall into Solomon's Porch. It is described by Josephus as immensely massive, and covered with plates of Corinthian bronze. Through this gate, only such as were pure, came in with their wives.

Quarter Sizes in Shoes!

Regals are now made in quarter sizes, just doubling the number of fittings in every style. 36 quarter sizes, 8 widths, making 288 different chances for a perfect fit in each shape. The new Regal quarter-size system marks the end of high-priced custom shoe-making; for no custom bootmaker in the world can make a last which will conform more closely to the size of your foot than a quarter-size Regal. Already conceded to be exact duplicates of the finest custom-made shoes in style, finish and material, Regals have now acquired the last requisite—perfect fit. No other shoe manufacturer can offer you quarter sizes, which means that no other dealer, in your local stores or by mail, can so accurately fit you—so thoroughly satisfy you.

Christian Work among Immigrants

THERE was born in Christiana, Norway, in the year 1845, a boy called Ernst Jackson (Isaacson). His parents were Christian people and from them he received excellent training. In 1867, when this boy had grown to young manhood, he came to America. Having no trade or profession, he worked with a willing hand at any honorable employment he could find, not despising even that of a day laborer. With good health and a clean heart as his capital, he soon was able to establish himself and little family in a comfortable home. This home being in New York City, Mr. Jackson found frequent opportunities to do Christian work, not the least of these being in the old Bethel ship, at the North River front, where the Gospel was preached to seafaring men.

Gradually his work broadened, and he began to visit the incoming vessels, always armed with Bibles and Testaments, which were eagerly received by the sailors. He became an agent of the New York Bible Society, his field being the immigrant station at Castle Garden. When this station was transferred to Ellis Island, the young missionary went there also, and here, day after day, for 365 days in the year, he has been on duty ever since.

There has been a marvelous influx of the Old World nations into this land of ours during the past few years. On one day in April, 1903, 10,236 aliens landed in New York—Germans, British, Scandinavians, Russians, Austrians, Italians, Polish, Finnish, and Huns, all furnished their quota of thousands, going to make up the almost endless stream flowing into United States ports. The armfuls of Bibles distributed daily among these peoples are printed in fourteen languages and twenty-five different dialects. Mr. Jackson says that, almost without exception, these are gratefully received, and the kind words which accompany the gift are always appreciated.

There are constant opportunities for assisting these bewildered travelers, who often find themselves in distress, mental and physical, upon landing at Ellis Island.

"Many times when I see their tears, I have to choke my own back," said the kind-hearted missionary, as he told of the scenes he witnessed almost daily. Sometimes the immigrants are greatly cast down, and need a kindly word to save them from absolute despair.

When the big vessels steam up the Narrows, the immigrants swarm the steerage decks for a glimpse of the new country.

Discarding their old clothing worn on the voyage, they array themselves in their best, all the gorgeous colors of the rainbow being represented in shawls, skirts, and waists. These simple folks are eager and expectant, the children no less than their elders; and they cling to the odds and ends of luggage, each one jealously guarding his share of the household goods they have brought from afar.

One day there appeared a sturdy little boy, topped off with a funny little hat, from under the brim of which peeped a laughing, sun-burned face. They spoke to him in Armenian, Bohemian, Finnish, Portuguese and Polish. No answer! Then more interpreters were sent for, and still he could not be classified. German and the different dialects, Croatian, Dakhuan and others were essayed, until the youngster finally broke out with, "Is there none of yez here speaks English?"

For twenty-seven years Mr. Jackson has worked among these people, and while there has been much to encourage and cheer him in his labor of love, he has been witness to many a heart-breaking scene. The saddest of all is when the long voyage is ended and "God's country" reached, and the poor man or woman for some reason is disappointed.

And these children—what of them, with their quaint dress and ways? It has been said that environment counts quite as much as heredity in the sum-total of man, and many of these children inherit nothing they need be ashamed of or afraid of. When they are educated and brought into contact with Americans, and especially where efforts are being made to sow the seed of the Gospel, before the immigrant has fairly landed on our shores, and when, through missions and social settlements, the better natures of these alien brothers and sisters are awakened by kindness, we may well be hopeful for their future.

MR. JACKSON AND HIS IMMIGRANT CHARGES

Another Great Battle in Manchuria

AFTER a hard-fought battle in Manchuria, lasting four days (from Oct. 11 to 14 inclusive), the Russian army, 200,000 strong, under Gen. Kouropatkin, sustained a crushing defeat at the hands of the three united Japanese armies, under the supreme command of Field Marshal Oyama. Kouropatkin, on Oct. 10, took the initiative, and on the following day his cavalry and artillery drove in the Japanese outposts and pushed back Oyama's front between Shikiatotze and Pensihi and in the district immediately north of the Yentai mines. On the following day (Oct. 12), the Japanese concentrated rapidly and assumed the offensive. Soon the heights east of Yentai were swept clear of Russians. For two days the battle raged along a front of nearly thirty miles, central between Mukden and Liao-Yang, and between the Taitse and Hun Rivers. Kouropatkin had one thousand cannon in action and the Japanese an even larger number.

An attempt by the Russians to turn the Japanese left failed, and resulted in a loss of fifteen Russian guns. On the 14th Oct., Kouropatkin telegraphed to the Czar admitting serious losses, and practically acknowledging complete defeat in the aggressive movement, which is supposed to have been ordered from St. Petersburg for the recapture of Liao-Yang. His telegram announced that the Russians were retiring to "positions previously prepared on the Shahke River." Field Marshal Oyama telegraphed to Tokio, claiming a substantial victory all along the line. Thirty-eight Russian guns had been taken, with many prisoners and a number of ammunition wagons. There are reports that the Russian losses in killed and wounded were nearly 38,000, but nothing reliable can yet be known. The Japanese losses will also be very heavy. At last accounts from Tokio telegrams, all the three Japanese armies were engaged in pursuing the fleeing Russians, and there was danger that Kouropatkin and his staff might be captured.

Pastor Wagner's Visit

ETHANY Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, was crowded on the occasion of the first sermon delivered in America by the Rev. Charles Wagner, author of The Simple Life. N. John Wanamaker introduced the distinguished French pastor. The latter said, in part:

"The ancients were wise in seeking God in nature. Every one who has a heart for duty, for majesty, for grandeur, must fall on his knees under that blue sky, before that immense sea, before the mighty storms that rise, with thunder and with lightning, over us. Every man must find behind the exterior of nature the grand unknown Creator, who has made all that is. But there is an old fight, an old struggle between the human heart and nature.

"Who has no eyes for the blue sky and the roseate morn and who has no love for nature is dead. But man has always been seeking to penetrate more deeply the meaning of nature, and against exterior nature he has had a mighty battle. Nature has been to him as a dark wall, through which he has striven to discern the something beyond.

"You love the sky, it will come down to you. That it should come down to us has been the old prayer, the old cry of the human soul. It has been heard, and God has come down to us. In Christ, God has been translated into human language; in the conscience of that Fellow Man all that is most precious, all that is worthy to be worshiped, has been brought near to us—in our practical life, in our suffering, in our death. There is a double revelation in the world in which we live. There is a revelation of shadow, of night, of destruction, of badness, and of hatred, and there is a revelation of light, of right, of happiness, of hope, and of love. You can be the messenger of light or the messenger of death. You can be the messenger of the rebellion against the Word of God if you have no love in your heart. Language is nothing without love, without deeds. You can be the messenger of despair, of discouragement, of grief, of sadness for your fellow-men. And in this world there are too many messengers of night. Be warned. You can be the messenger of night for your fellow-men, and take care.

But now let me tell you some more beautiful and hopeful truth. You can be a messenger of light. If you have watched the sun rise, you have seen that you were at first in darkness and everything about you was veiled; the tops of the hills and the mountains were in shadow. Then slowly the first light began to appear and to spread out, and then by and by came the sun, the rising sun, gilding the skies with crimson and gold, and every leaf and every tree and every church steeple and the tops of the hills and of the mountains shared in the glory of the sun, and became as it were houses of light, reflecting light upon all around them.

You can, if your heart is standing in the light of God—you can become a light for those whose lives are in darkness, and, seeing you, they will have seen the Father smiling upon them and encouraging them.

Answered Prayers

Never. "I wish to express my gratitude to God for the wonderful answer to prayer in saving life."

C. L., Long Grove, Ia. "After twenty years of illness, the Lord has given me success."

Mrs. A. J. P., Wibaux, Mont. "The Lord heard my prayer and delivered me and mine from a great affliction."

P., Maine. "God has answered so many prayers for me. His love to all of his children is wonderful."

R. D. and Wife, Washington, D. C. "We wish to add our testimony to the fact that God answers prayer."

E. H., Mich. "God has many times directly answered my prayers. Oh, that we might have a childlike simplicity! I will ever bless his name."

F. D., Donnellsen, Ill. "I write to add my testimony of thanks and praise for the answer to prayer for the health of a dear one, and God heard and answered."

W., Asbury Park. "I wish to praise the Lord for answering the earnest prayers offered for the recovery of a member of my family, who was very ill and high unto death."

P. H., Palmyra, N. J. "I promised the Lord that if he would answer a prayer when I was in great distress of mind, I would acknowledge it openly and praise his name. He did."

J., Sheldon, Vt. "A Christian brother in Vermont desires to acknowledge the goodness of the Lord in answering directly his prayers. He does not fulfill a promise made to the Lord."

H. E., Marysville, Kans. "I know that God answers prayer if our prayer is faithful in Jesus' name. He answered a prayer for me in his own way that seemed almost a miracle."

C., Emerson, Man. "Although young in life, I have proved the goodness of God our Father in answering our prayers. I am persuaded that God answers as he sees best. Pray without ceasing."

F. W., Denver, Colo. "The Lord has been so faithful and gracious in answering my prayer, that I rejoice. May the good Lord sustain us all and keep us under the shadow of his protecting wing."

Mrs. L. P., Rochester, N. Y. "I wish to acknowledge a direct answer to prayer, and praise God for it. I feel confident that the 'Answered Prayer' column is a source of inspiration to very many."

S., Perrysburg, O. "I am able to testify again that God is a hearer and answerer of prayer. I feel it my duty to bear witness to that fact. I feel it written, 'In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he will direct thy path.'"

L. B., New Castle, Pa. "I wish to add my testimony that God hears and answers prayers. He has to me fulfilled the promise, 'And it shall come to pass, that before they call, I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.'"

One Reader. "After many years of wandering, I came to him in the weakest of faith, and he restored me to myself. He strengthened and blessed me, and I have proved him true. I praise him for my husband."

One Who Loves and Trusts Him. "MOTHERSOWE. 'When my soul was greatly burdened, I cried to Jesus for help, and while it seemed almost impossible for a burden of such nature as mine to be removed by prayer, yet he heard my prayers and answered them.'"

Mrs. C. R. S., East New York. "The Lord never fails a promise. In answer to prayer, Jesus, our ever-bearer, comforts me. If we would just have faith and try, then we would see and acknowledge that the Lord is good, that he will never leave nor forsake us."

Mrs. J. H. W. "I wish to join the dear ones to acknowledge my gratitude to a loving Heavenly Father, who hears and answers our earnest prayers. Now God has answered my many prayers, and I am expecting in his own good time my prayer for my dear husband may be answered."

Mrs. F. I. McC., Sheridan, Mont. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me in answer to prayer. I have found strength and grace sufficient to carry me through all the trials of the Christian life, and I believe his love for me will endure to the end. I am an invalid waiting to be delivered. I am trusting all to the finisher of my faith."

A. E. S., Penna. "I wish to say for the help of others that I know God does answer prayer. Recently, when there was one last possibility, of something I had prayed so earnestly for, being granted, I continued to pray, and received what I prayed for. It has been the means of increasing my faith, as I hope it may be for others."

Mrs. L. F., Sycamore. "I wish every one who is in trouble would take all their griefs and anxieties to the Lord in prayer. Ever since I began to put my trust in God, and to ask him to help me, my prayers were answered. How glorious it is to feel that the Lord is our confidential friend, that he will stand by us. 'If God be for us, who can be against us?'"

Mrs. A. L. W., Denver, Colo. "I was bowed down with a burden, even to despair, and I fervently prayed for deliverance to Him who has promised to hear and answer in times of trouble. Now I know and fully realize that my prayer and pleadings were heard and answered, and I can now see the answer coming to other prayers."

Class Leader. "I truly believe the Bible, the Church and God never had a worse enemy than myself up to my fifty-first year. I was sorely afflicted financially, physically, and in deep sorrow at the loss of a dear child whom I worshiped. To get rid of earth and its trials, I contemplated suicide. Praying Christian friends were sent of God to persuade me, to earnestly plead for deliverance from the great darkness I was in, and the God whom I denied would certainly make himself known to me. I plead. He heard, and he answered. I sought with my whole heart, and he saved, even me. None will be turned away. Come, infidel or whatever the class of sinner you may be, and find the One who can alone deliver, for 'he is strong to deliver, mighty to save,' and almighty to keep."

Acknowledgments of answered prayers have also been received from F. C. McGinley, Marysville, Tenn.; H. R. Dillon, Washington, D. C.; G. W. Layne, Ironton, O.; M. E. P. Williston; Florence S. Rebekah at the Well

The beautiful daughter of Bethuel, who became the bride of Isaac, has frequently been the subject of the artist's inspiration. In the present instance, the artist shows her at the moment of her arrival at the well of Nahor, and just before her meeting with Abraham's servant. It was at "the time of the evening that women go out to draw water." "Fair to look upon" was Rebekah, says the record, and as sweet and gracious as fair, for her spontaneous hospitality, no less than her pleasing words, won the heart of the trusted messenger, even before he had inquired of her, "Whose daughter art thou?"

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Story of Vergilius

IN his new book, Vergilius, a Tale of the Coming of Christ, Irving Bacheller has produced a story which, for dramatic force and intrinsic beauty, will be ranked in the same category with Lew Wallace's wonderful story of Ben Hur. Vergilius, a young Roman noble in attendance at the court of Augustus Caesar, is the hero of the tale, and it would be difficult to imagine a character more finely portrayed than this young patrician, whose courage, patriotism, fidelity and enthusiasm awaken the admiration of the reader. Essentially pagan and pleasure-loving as Roman society was at the time, the dissipated court is not without a few noble characters, whose virtues stand out in strong contrast with the vices of those around them. Appius and his sister, the Lady Arria, are proteges of Augustus, and prime favorites at court. The old emperor is shown as a shrewd ruler, outwardly mild and philosophic, yet governing with a hand of iron; jealous of any encroachment upon his authority, watchful of the plots of his enemies, and rarely gifted in divining the thoughts and purposes of men. For Vergilius, who falls in love with Arria, he has an especial liking, perceiving in the youth the making of a statesman and a warrior after his own heart. Among others at the court is Antipater, a crafty and treacherous prince, son of Herod, King of Judea, who is Vergilius' rival in love, though Lady Arria distrusts him. The extraordinary plot Antipater weaves about Vergilius to destroy him, in which he well-nigh succeeds, furnishes the principal theme of the story. Vergilius triumphs over his enemies through his inflexible fidelity to Caesar and his love for Arria, a passion which ennoble his whole life and ultimately opens the hearts of both the lovers "to the knowledge of mighty things," and leads them to forsake paganism and embrace Christianity.

There are many powerfully written passages in the book, that thrill the reader with a vivid sense of reality. Among these are Vergilius' encounter in the palace of Antipater, who had entrapped him through a wager into a contest with a black leopard; his temptation by Salome, the beautiful but profligate daughter of Herod; his battle with the traitor, Antipater, in the arena, when the Roman was saved from the mad prince's dagger by Cyran, a beautiful Jewish-Christian slave girl, who received the fatal blow in her own breast, and died with words of love upon her lips. But these and other great dramatic passages in the book can only be grasped in their wonderful power and strange fascination by a thorough reading of the book itself. Much of the charm of Vergilius lies in the beautiful love story, which, after many vicissitudes, has so happy an ending.

The book is published by Harpers, New York. Price $1.35.

Good Humor at Home*

WHAT a beneficent thing an amiable and genial disposition is in this world of ours! It is one of the most charming forms of kindness. Since the world is full of troubles great and small, and man, our companion, has his heart full of them, let us mingle a few smiles with these shadows. Smiles lighten many a cross and smooth over many a difficulty; indeed, they change the aspect of all our relations with others. Good humor is a power; it is a victory gained over brutal facts and over our own hearts; it transforms the world. It, too, is contagious, but with a happy sort of contagion; it is often recompensed by the awakening of its echo in others. It must be confessed that there are people who sometimes make us lose it, but we should be sorry for them. How sad it must be to be cross-grained and peevish! Look at the matter from this point, when you have to do with these unfortunates who might well ruffle the meekness of a lamb or provoke an oyster to discussion. In the long run, few men can resist good humor; they generally take the tone of him who accosts them, grumble with those who grumble, and smile at those who smile.

One day I encountered two people searching for apartments on a certain boulevard. One greeted me with: "Heavens! what disagreeable janitors there are in this quarter!" "What kindly people one finds among these janitors, so courteous and attentive," said the other. Evidently these two persons had two fashions of approach. You don't meet about lodgings and apartments a greater abundance than elsewhere of stoic philosophers, inaccessible to ordinary emotions; the attitude of those you encounter there depends a good deal upon your own.

Good humor works miracles daily. You say: "This person is insufferable, impossible!" Good humor replies: "Why, no! I find him very agreeable."

I once knew an old man whom acute suffering had made a frightful pessimist, and given a mordant tongue. Nobody could get on with him; everyone became infected with his temper and repaid him in kind, to his further exasperation. But at last somebody was found, not to vanquish him, for that would have entailed curing his ills, but to soothe and calm him. What it needed was a kind and smiling face and inexhaustible patience. The poor man was so grateful! I once heard him say this to his benefactress: "Oh, thank you! I had come to the conclusion that I was a wretch, but your kindness, which I so little deserve, proves to me that I am not that, only a poor unfortunate."

BOOKS RECEIVED

Food for the Tropics. A short description of native products, suitable for food in tropical countries. By T. M. Macknight. Published by W. Thacker & Co., 2 Creed Lane, E. C., London.

In the popular "Unit Series" of Books, there have just been issued from the publishing house of Howard Wilford Bell, New York: The Story of Words, by Archbishop Richard Chevenix Trench (a famous book which first appeared in 1851), thirteen units or 320 pages, cloth; 56 cents. Domestic Manners of the Americans, by Mrs. Frances M. Trollope, seventeen units, 402 pp., cloth; 64 cents. National Documents, American State papers from 1606 to the present time, 504 pp., twenty-one units, cloth; 72 cents. Letters and Addresses of Abraham Lincoln, sixteen units, 399 pages, cloth; 46 cents. The Life of Jesus, by Renan; 19 units, pages, cloth; 68 cents. These are all standards, clearly printed and well bound. Add eight cents postage per volume.

The Crossing, by Winston Churchill, author of Richard Carvel, The Crisis, etc., illustrated by Sydney Adamson and Lilian Bayliss. This is a story to delight the reader of stories that deal with the early days of American history, the days of exploration, frontier pioneering, Indian perils, and the troubles of our forefathers with King George's men. A capital story, well worth the reading; full of thrilling incidents in connection with "the beginnings of that great movement across the mountains which swept resistless across the Continent until at last it saw the Pacific itself!"—the days of Daniel Boone, George Rogers Clark and other famous frontiersmen. Pp. 598, cloth covers. Price $1.50. The Macmillan Co., London and New York, publishers.

How the United States Became a Nation, by John Fiske. This is a reprint of one of the early and less important works of the author, on American History. Doubtless it was written with a view to its use as a High School text-book; but, like everything from the pen of John Fiske, it possesses solid literary and historical merit. The book covers the period from the inauguration of Washington to the end of the Civil War, and the subject is treated by topics. Thus, the history of the "Slave Power" is considered by itself, as an independent subdivision. The value of the work is in its forcible and graphic presentation of large ideas, without distracting detail. In any book of this kind, the writer must necessarily take sides, and Mr. Fiske's conclusions will not suit everybody. Nor does he invariably observe the canons of good taste, as, for example, on page 174 where he says, speaking of the Supreme Court, when the famous Dred Scott case came before it, that of the nine judges, "five were slaveholders and some of the others were doughfaces." We have no hesitation, however, in recommending the book as a strong and wholesome statement of the evolution of American nationality. Ginn & Co., New York, publishers.

*From By the Fireside, by Rev. Charles Wagner, author of The Simple Life. Translated from the French by Mary Louise Hendee, pp. 329, cloth covers. McClure, Phillips & Co., N. Y., publishers.

A CENTURY OF MISSIONS*

HOW wonderful is the story of missions, which have had little more than a century of existence! A hundred years ago, the Church was timidly and tentatively feeling its way toward a practical obedience to the Divine command to preach the Gospel among all nations. Men like our own Eliot had shown what could be done, but the Church was slow to learn the lesson. But in the closing years of the eighteenth century there came to men's minds in different places a sense of neglected duty. In the years that immediately followed, the Church Missionary Society, the Baptist Society, and the London Missionary Society sprang into life. They were followed by the Wesleyan Society and the American Board. Noble men went out—Morrison to China, Moffatt to Africa, Martyn and Carey to India, Judson to Burma, Williams to Polynesia, and in the first few years of the nineteenth century showed the Churches the way to the great missionary field. Those were hard times and their work was difficult and laborious. They had to contend with the lethargy of the Churches at home, to learn the language of the people to whom they went, and to do the pioneer work in heathen lands. What wonder if progress was slow and the results were small! But they were sufficient to stir the hearts of God's people everywhere.

Half a century was given up to this pioneer labor, and then the Churches awakened. As new fields opened, they were swiftly occupied. Men were found ready to go out, helpers were sent to those already engaged, new societies were organized; and old ones, finding how large was the opportunity, systematized their efforts and prepared for larger service. Men like Moody and Venn, by their meetings, aroused the home Churches into new life, and that life found its outlet in missionary enthusiasm. Women took part in the service, and proved how much they could do in rendering valuable assistance. Medical missions came into life, and became a mighty force in helping the movement forward. The Student Volunteer Movement enlisted the services of scholarly men, who saw in missionary labor an opportunity for consecrated lives.

Thus the Churches have moved forward, and, after a hundred years of labor, have a record of success which puts to shame their long somnolence. There is danger now of reaction. The novelty has worn off, the romance of pioneer work is gone, and the era of quiet upbuilding is introduced. The need for money and for prayer continues. There must be in the home Churches continuous effort, the societies must be supported, and the work, so well and nobly begun, must be carried forward.

[A reader, S. F. Rippler, Philadelphia, sends these verses with this statement; "I copied this probably twenty years ago, and do not remember the author; but it will interest many readers now."]

THERE stalked a fiend o'er the glad green earth
By the side of the reaper Death;
He dazzles alike with the glare of mirth,
Or stilleth the light of the household hearth
With his foul and withering breath.

He stalketh abroad, with his hydra head,
And there gathereth in his train—
The failing foot, and the strong man's tread,
The restless living, the ghastly dead,
And misery, want and pain.

He nerves the arm of relentless hate
With the goblet's beaded foam;
He lurks in the halls of the rich and great,
In the beggar's moan at the palace gate,
And curses the poor man's home.

He grudgeth the poor their daily bread,
And filleteth the drunkard's bowl
With want and woe, remorse and dread,
With a nerveless hand and a failing head,
And a curse on his deathless soul.

INVISIBLE TELEPHONES FOR THE DEAF.

What proper eye-glasses are to failing sight—Wilson's invisible Ear-Drums are to failing hearing. Just as simple and common-sense, and on the same principle as eye-glasses, for they are sound-magnifiers, as glasses are sight magnifiers.

In fact, they are tiny telephones of soft flexible material, fitting into the orifice of the ears so comfortably that, from the first day's wear, you forget them. They are also invisible, even to a sharp-sighted observer.

Meantime they can be removed, or inserted, in a minute, and worn for weeks at a time, sleeping and waking, because they are skillfully arranged for perfect ventilation and anti-friction.

These little wireless telephones make it as easy to hear, and define, vague sounds, as correct eyeglasses make it easy to read fine print and decipher hair-line writing.

And the longer you wear them, the better your hearing grows, because they begin at once to strengthen the hearing nerves by taking the strain off them, thus removing the tendency to irritation. They also protect the sensitive inner surfaces of the ear from raw winds, cold, dust, and sudden or piercing sounds.

They strengthen the ear nerves by resting them, and they rest them by making the hearing easy, distinct and effortless. They restore to the wearer that cheerful, confident, self-satisfied feeling which results from being able to converse freely with those around him without taxing their patience and charity.

Wilson Ear Drums concentrate all the sound waves upon the centre of the human ear drum.

This centre vibrates ten times as much as any portion nearer the edge, and this vibration is what transmits sound to the nerves of hearing.

When all the sound is concentrated on the centre of the ear drum (instead of being weakened by spreading over its surface) that sound is magnified enormously.

People who had not heard a clock strike in years can, and do, hear that same clock tick distinctly anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson Ear Drums.

Ear-ache, Buzzing noises in the head, discharging ears, perforated ear-drums and deafness are every day being overcome by the use of these ingenious little "Ear-resting" sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book about deafness, explains their construction, and contains the experience of four hundred persons (out of the tens of thousands) who use them; it will be mailed free on request.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Doctors, Telegraph Operators, four hundred men and women of all ranks, voluntarily relate in this book how their deafness was promptly overcome, without discomfort or detection.

Some of these people live in your own locality, and if you are deaf, or threatened with deafness, you can't afford to ignore their evidence.

If your hearing is worth anything to you, don't postpone its recovery—write to-day while you think of it. Get the free book. Address Wilson Ear Drum Co., 1914 Todd Building, Louisville, Ky.

The Hidden King

By MRS. M. BAXTER

WHEN Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, King of Judah, saw that her son was dead, she arose and destroyed all the seed royal of the house of Judah. But God raised up a woman, Jehosheba, Ahaziah's sister, the daughter of Jehoram, who was married to Jehoiada, the priest; and she rescued her little nephew Joash, Ahaziah's son, who was an infant, and hid him with his nurse in the house of God for six years. Later on God said by Jeremiah: "David shall never want a man to sit upon his throne" (Jer. 33: 17), and now the living son of David at the right hand of God is the representative of the house of David, as well as the representative of mankind. And "he shall sit on the throne of his father David," in Jerusalem in the millennium (Luke 1: 32), as well as upon the throne of the universe.

Jehoiada, the godly priest, and his godly wife, Jehosheba, were probably the lights for God in Jerusalem which shone in these dark and sinful times. How much of prayer went up from their chambers in the house of the Lord, who can tell; or how much the burden of the Lord weighed upon their hearts! The first impressions of the child Joash must have been formed from the spirit and example, rare indeed in those days, of his faithful aunt. Jehosheba, the sister of Ahaziah, must have known the baneful influence of her grandmother Jezebel, and of her mother Athaliah; but God must have sealed this woman for himself. The power of God to bring to himself a member of such a family and such a court, encourages us to pray for those who are placed in the most difficult circumstances. He has means to save even such. Jehosheba must have very really known God, and he trusted her with the care of the royal child, and enabled her to keep him hidden from Athaliah, and to keep hidden from him the seductive idolatry which prevailed outside his hiding-place. How far this child knew of his future destiny we cannot tell, but that his uncle and aunt were alive to their great responsibility to God is very evident.

It was when Joash was nearly seven years old, that Jehoiada sent and fetched, evidently secretly, for fear of the wicked queen, the rulers and the captains into the house of the Lord; and he showed them the king's son, the lawful heir to the throne of Judah. The priest must have known the mind of the people, and God showed him when his time for action was come. Then he planned a coup d'etat, and appointed to each man his place and his part in the transaction which was to take place: the coronation of the boy king in the Temple, in the name of the Lord. One-third was to keep watch at the king's house, that it should not be broken down; and two-thirds were to keep the watch of the house of the Lord round about the king. A formidable bodyguard stood about the king, when Jehoiada brought him forth and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony (probably the copy of the law), which he should "read in all the days of his life" (Deut. 17: 18-20). "And they made him king and anointed him; and they clapped their hands and said, God save the king."

And Athaliah! God has said: "The memory of the just is blessed; but the name of the wicked shall rot" (Prov. 10: 7). How true of both Jezebel and Athaliah! Again: "The fear of the wicked, it shall come upon him; destruction shall be to the workers of iniquity" (Prov. 10: 24, 29). How these words were fulfilled in both these wicked women! When Athaliah heard the noise of the guard and of the people, she came to the people into the Temple of the Lord. And when she looked, behold, the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was, and the princes and the trumpeters of the king, and all the people of the land rejoiced, and blew with trumpets; and Athaliah rent her clothes and cried: "Treason, treason." O if the godly Jehoshaphat had seen what the consequence would be of his unblest alliance with the house of Ahab, and that the abominable daughter of the wicked Jezebel would reign on the throne of David, how ashamed and confounded he would have been!

We send you our "1900" Washer free of charge, on a month's trial. We pay the freight on it to your home station, at our own expense. YOU don't risk a penny, and WE don't ask from you any cash deposit, note, contract nor security. You simply write us for the month's trial, and we do the rest. If, on a four weeks' test, you can't wash clothes with it equal to best hand-work, in HALF THE TIME, with half the wear and tear and with HALF THE EFFORT, send it back to your nearest Railroad Station, that's all. When you are convinced it saves you FOUR hours labor out of every EIGHT hour weekly washing, KEEP the machine. Then you must pay us 50 cents a week, till the washer is paid for. The four hours a week our "1900" Washer SAVES YOU would have cost you for washerwoman time 60 cents. Your own time (if you do the washing yourself) is worth as much as a washerwoman's, and any servant's time costs you board and money equal to this, in the long run. The "1900" Washer lasts at least five years. Every year it will save you about $33.00 in labor. In five years this amounts to $165.00—think of that! In the free month's trial alone it will save an average family $2.00 and you assume no risk whatever no responsibility during the trial. Isn't this the broadest, and fairest offer ever made you? We may withdraw it to-morrow, if it overcrows our factory. But whoever answers this advertisement shall have the benefit of the offer, provided you write to us promptly on reading it. Shall we send you a Washer on trial, to be paid for as it pays you? Answer TO-DAY, while the offer is open, and while you think of it. Address me direct for personal attention viz., R. F. Bieber, Gen'l Mgr., The "1900" Washer Company, 200 North Henry Street, Binghamton, N. Y.

God's Promises*

PERIODS of depression come to the Christian, as to other men. At such times the promises of God, scattered through his Word, are a comfort and an encouragement. They are of two kinds: those that relate to the condition of the world, and those that apply to the personal condition of the Christian himself.

The world is so obviously governed by the principles of evil, so utterly given up to greed and selfishness, so intent on making money, and so oblivious to the higher life to which God is calling it, that there seems no hope of the triumph of righteousness. Even the church is becoming dull and cold, and the members of it differ so little from worldlings, that we are tempted to give up hope of any reform coming from it. If Christians patterned their lives on the life of Christ, though they might be few in number, we might hope that eventually the peace and beauty of their lives would win others. But they do not. They prove that they are governed by worldly motives and worldly principles, and that God has been forgotten in the rush and turmoil of life. Looking at all this, the Christian is depressed until he turns to the Word, and there finds the promise that out of this chaos and confusion God is pledged to bring victory to his people. We are bidden to trust in him, and are assured that he will yet establish his name in the earth, and that the time will yet come when every knee shall bow to Christ and every tongue shall confess him.

Then there are the personal promises. In the struggle of life we are glad to find that there are the promises "to him that overcometh." The fight is often hard, but there is a palm of victory to him that fights bravely to conquer the sins of the flesh and the allurements of the world. There are promises for those who, in spite of failure, still maintain the strife, promises to the repentant backslider. Our God is kind and merciful. He knows our frame and remembers that we are dust. When we are tempted to give up the struggle and say who is sufficient for these things, we are taught that God gives strength to the weak and promises his help to those that seek it. In sickness, there are promises of comfort and of support. In old age, there are promises of eternal youth, and in death itself there are promises of eternal life. It is almost impossible to open his Word at any place, without finding these gems given by our Heavenly Father to cheer his people and to encourage them to trust in him.

A Washerwoman's Plea

To the Commissioner of Pensions

These lines were suggested by your reply to L. M. D., in THE MAIL-BAG, September 21.

Glad you do not wish to strip
From the washerwoman's lip
Any song that she can sing,
Any hope that she can bring,
For the children all are grown
All have troubles of their own;
And her soldier helps no more,
War and want with him are o'er.

Sore disease and eyesight dim,
Broken down with care of him,
Sad old age and sure decay
Shade her life's remaining day.
And the sharp-toothed wolf she fears—
Like the spool upon the shears—
Shield from danger; hear her plea,
Let her portion ample be.

Succor for the widow's need
Has the Government decreed,
So her eyes are unto you
For that pension now her due;
Be the right hand of that Friend
Who will shield her to the end,
For the claim is just and true
And our eyes are unto you.

Be Well—Wholesome and Happy

A Good Figure, Clear Skin, Strong Brain, Vivacity and Buoyant Step are the Result of Perfect Health

OVER 10,000 WOMEN ARE STUDYING THEMSELVES

You will doubtless take up some special line of study this year—why not make an exhaustive study of yourself, determining whether every vital organ and every force of your being is perfect, whether your brain has reached its perfect development, whether your figure is symmetrical and whether you have dynamic force and magnetism necessary for attractiveness and for wholesome influence and usefulness. Many a woman by fifteen minutes work in the privacy of her own room has surprised her husband, family and friends by the results of her self study this year. The day of the "slender figure" has disappeared—there is too much to do, to enjoy, to love and to live for in these gloriously progressing days to permit any woman to waste herself in semi-invalidism. Men want bright, buoyant, well-poised women who can rise with them, appreciate their efforts and share their triumphs. I have worked with nearly 10,000 women during the past two years, studying with each individual woman to bring her to her best.

EVERY VITAL ORGAN STRONG

In my instructions with you by mail, I completely study your case, directing your exercises, bathing and diet, giving you work to bring the strength to every vital organ, every nerve center, teach you to breathe, to stand and to walk well and the reflex action of the strength of the vital organs of rhythmic movement upon the mind is worth more to women than the mere physical. One woman expressed this reflex action to me in her report, "Miss Corroft, I used to feel so depressed and now I feel as if I can look every man, woman and child squarely in the face with a feeling that I am rising to my very best."

EVERY WOMAN CAN HAVE A CLEAR SKIN AND A GOOD FIGURE

Unless the body is properly poised it is impossible for the vital organs and nerve centers to do their proper work. From a health standpoint as well as from a standpoint of beauty it is necessary for every woman to carry herself well and any woman can have a good figure. No woman needs to have an undeveloped chest, neck or bust, in fact, be undeveloped in any particular of her body, and the woman who carries about forty to fifty pounds of superfluous flesh every time she moves has my sympathy, for I realize it is not necessary for her to carry this burden.

WRITE ME

Will you not mark with the letter (x) on the attached blank the points which interest you and if there are any particulars in regard to your case which you feel I need, write me about them also and I will tell you frankly whether I can help you. I have worked solely with women for the past 13 years and I know how to understand as well as help them. As I give every pupil my personal attention, the number is necessarily limited. I never take a pupil unless I feel positive I can help her. Write me fully and frankly of your special difficulties, tell me what you want to gain or change and I will tell you what I can do for you and send you letters from women whom I have benefited and relieved of similar ailments. I will send you, too, my booklet on how to stand correctly, every woman should have it. My work is not a "Cure All" system, but I do build up the strength of all the vital organs, lungs, heart, nerve centers, send your blood bounding through your veins as it did when you were a child and give you that dignified bearing which at once bespeaks culture and refinement.

I HAVE BROUGHT HEALTH TO THOUSANDS OF WOMEN

I am giving you below extracts from three letters of my pupils on my desk as I write: "For one to realize the benefit I have derived, one ought to have seen me before I commenced and now—several of my friends not having seen me for some time, have told me they should hardly recognize me if I had not spoken. I had rheumatism in my ankles which were swollen most of the time." "I have lost altogether sixty-seven pounds." "They are worth their weight in gold to me. I have entirely recovered in less than six weeks from the beginning of my lessons of the most painful attack of what the doctors called 'Catarrh of the Stomach.' Now, I never feel a sign of pain there."

I wish you could read the letters from my pupils any one day. I know it would do your heart good as it does mine.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. L. Linn, Mass. 1. Why is the date of the Crucifixion given as A. D. 30, when Jesus was at that time thirty-three years old? 2. Is it right to give intoxicating liquor to visitors or to keep it in the house?

1. It has been proved that Jesus was born at least four years before the Christian Era. The record of Herod's death proves that fact. The calculations of Dominus Exiguus, who fixed the date, were wrong. Herod died B.C. 4. We know he was alive when Christ was born, because he slaughtered the children. We conclude, therefore, that the Crucifixion took place A. D. 30. 2. It is wrong to offer visitors intoxicating liquor. See Hab. 2:15.

Reader, Binghamton, N. Y. 1. Is love to God a direct gift to all who ask for it? 2. Do those who have repented of sin and been forgiven for it ever afterward commit the same sins?

1. Love to God is not given in that way. The man who asks God to enable him to love him will probably have his prayer answered by some experience that produces love in his heart. It may be a painful experience, in which he loses the affection of friends and he turns to God as the one Being whose love is sure and so helpful to him that he loves him in return. There are other ways in which he may be led to realize how much God loves him. It is generally, as John says, "We love him because he first loved us." You must not expect love to be given by miracle. 2. Unhappily they do. It should not be so, because the man who has repented and been forgiven, ought ever afterward to watch against those sins. But when the sin is a vice, to which he is prone, he is liable to fall under its power again.

I. B. S., Goffs, Kan. What is the difference between the soul and the spirit (Heb. 4:12)?

The soul in this passage represents the animal desires, affections, passions; the spirit represents the higher nature. The distinction is between the man, who in common with brutes, has a life separate from the corporeal, but does not rise to the higher perceptions, and the spiritual man who seeks after God. The soul of the beast that goeth downward is an expression used in the same sense in Ecclesiastes. The spiritual in man raises him above the mere animal nature, and gives him the power to enter into relations with the Infinite.

E. H. G., Clarkson, Va. What was Christ's meaning in telling his disciples (Luke 21:19) to possess their souls in patience?

He was warning them of coming persecution and trial. They were not to be impatient, but to quietly wait. Though they might be imprisoned, and even suffer martyrdom, they would not perish. They would, like Stephen, be caught up to heaven. Their bodies might die, but their souls would be saved. In patience they were to possess their souls, and not be distressed or anxious.

L. A. I., Herman, Neb. What is the meaning of the wise and prudent in I. Cor. 1:19-28?

The same as Christ gave them in Matt. 12:25. They do not cast any reflection on real wisdom, as they are not contrasted with folly and imprudence, but with babes. It is those who are wise in their own conceit who are represented as failing. There are many who reject the truth because it is not in accord with their belief. They will not accept what they do not understand. There are some things that must be taken on faith. If you told a man who had never heard of the telephone that it was possible to speak to a man hundreds of miles away, he might, if he was a man learned in his own esteem, reject the idea and say it was not possible. A child who did not know, might accept your assertion and believe, because you said you had used the instrument. Paul says it is so with the Gospel. The Greek thought it foolishness, but every one who had believed it and had tried it, found it was wisdom, the very power of God.

P. H., Matawan, N. J. 1. Why was the wedding guest mentioned (Matt. 22:12), so severely punished for not wearing a wedding garment? 2. What is the unpardonable sin?

1. Wedding garments were provided for the guests at a royal wedding. The man who was found without one, must have rejected the garment provided. He represented those who think they are good enough, as they are and do not see any necessity for a new birth. 2. There are many explanations of the unpardonable sin, but the one most generally believed, is that it consisted in attributing to Satan the power to work miracles, thus insulting the Holy Spirit. Christ regarded the sin as so heinous, that he said the man who committed it could not hope for pardon.

See Pages 944-945 for Our New Premium Propositions

M. L., Tidoute, Pa. What reason is there for thinking that the Lord's prayer in Matt. 6 was given earlier than the same prayer in Luke 6?

Many suggestions have been made to explain the differences between Matthew's report and that of Luke. One is that they were different sermons, delivered at different times and places. Another is that the sermons were one and the same, but that Luke condensed his report from that of Matthew. The most rational explanation is that the two reports are of the same sermon, taken independently, and that they differ as would the reports of two listeners taken to-day, when no attempt is made to produce a verbatim report. Matthew and Luke record the sayings that impressed each. Luke omits much that is given by Matthew, but adds matter that Matthew omits. Many scholars, however, contend that they are distinct sermons, delivered at different periods to different congregations. There is at present no means of deciding which is the correct view.

Reader, Harvard, Ill. Do not the churches belong to Jesus of Nazareth? If so, why are they dedicated to St. Peter, St. Joseph, St. Mary, and so on? Why have they been taken away from the one who sacrificed his life for them, and given to his followers? The Chinese and Japanese pray to their ancestors to intercede and help them through. The Greek or Russian Church, also the Roman Church, pray to the saints to intercede and help them into paradise. What is the difference between praying to one's ancestors, or to the saints?

The naming of churches after eminent Christians whose names are inseparably associated with the early days of Christianity is a custom that is sanctioned by long usage. In the Protestant churches at least, it does not imply that the churches are dedicated to those for whom they are named any more than it implies that the Protestant worshippers are to pray to the saints. As a matter of fact, in every Christian Church, Christ is, or ought to be, recognized as the Head, and the conferring of an individual name upon the building to distinguish it from others cannot detract from his headship. Ancestor worship (which is wholly heathen) has nothing to do with the matter.

Alex. G. The verses you mention are in Longfellow's famous poem "In the Arid at Springfield." The lines are:

The tumult of each sacked and burning village;
The shout that every prayer for mercy drove;
The soldiers' revels in the midst of pillage;
The wail of famine in beleaguered towns;

The bursting shell, the gateway wrenched asunder;
The rattling musketry, the clashing blade;
And ever and anon, in tones of thunder,
The diapason of the cannonade.

Is it, oh man, with such discordant noises,
With such accursed instruments as these,
Thou drownest nature's sweet and kindly voices
And jarrest the celestial harmonies?

There could hardly be a grander picture of war than is presented in these lines.

G. H. S., Brooklyn, N. Y. Will you kindly inform me when, where, by whom, and what occasioned the writing of the hymn,

Jesus, I my cross have taken,
All to leave and follow thee, etc.?

It was written by Rev. Henry Francis (born 1793, died 1847). In 1818 he was at for to console a brother clergyman, who was dying. Neither of the two was a full believer, but they studied the Bible together and Lyte perceived the truth of the Gospel and his whole life was transformed. To commemorate this change he wrote the hymn.

Mrs. E. C. S., Vermont. 1. If you can provide an education for your son, without absolutely impoverishing yourselves or depriving your other children of their due, you will doubt do well. His teacher's report as to the boy's ability and character is such as to satisfy you in making a sacrifice for his sake. The passage in Tim. 5:6 is meant as a reproof to the idle and improvident, who, no matter what their social position and abilities are, are worthless if they neglect to provide for the wants of their own household.

Mrs. J. A., Braymer, Mo. 1. Is it proper a preacher comes home with one, after a night service at church, to have him read and pray before retiring? 2. When our pastor engages a minister to help carry on a revival, is it right for the pastor to pay that minister, or for the church to do so?

1. Church services should not, in any sense, take the place of family devotions. We should think it quite proper to invite the pastor to join with you, but not to let him bear the burden of the whole. 2. It depends altogether on the arrangement. In a great majority of cases the church pays the evangelist.

A PERSONAL NOTE FROM DR. KLOPSCH

I APPEAL TO ALL MY CHRISTIAN HERALD FRIENDS to come to my assistance at this, the busiest and most trying season of the year.

Orders by the thousands will soon pour in daily from every side, and I always endeavor to make the prompt filling of every order a matter of personal interest.

How much this adds to the cares of an exceptionally busy man only they can know who have personally experienced such a phenomenal rush at a time when every moment seemed already mortgaged by other matters of apparently equal urgency.

A family of nearly 250,000 members has many wants, and to gratify and satisfy these wants in an entirely acceptable manner is one of the calls that must be recognized and properly responded to.

To do this is, at best, no easy task, but especially difficult when inexperienced help must necessarily be employed to assist.

If our friends would help us by anticipating their renewals and premium orders by just a few weeks—or even a few days—they would enable us to do the work much more accurately and expeditiously and at the same time relieve me personally of much of the strain.

There are instances when this may be inconvenient or impracticable, and then we would not ask you to share the burden; but, if altogether convenient, please co-operate with me to the extent of sending your renewal as early as possible, and be assured in advance of my sincerest gratitude for any relief you may afford me in that direction.

MR. NORTH IN KOREAN DRESS

AT H-SIN-MIN-TUN—CHINESE CROWDS AT THE RAILWAY DEPOT

A TYPICAL HUNGHOOSA

On Manchurian Battle-Fields

A Remarkable Journey Among the Fighting Japanese, Russians and Hunghoozas

BY FREDERICK A. NORTH

Mr. North is already known to our readers as the correspondent who courageously traveled across Russia and Manchuria over the Trans-Siberian Railway four years ago, when the Boxer troubles were at their height and war was raging along the Amur River. He has now completed a second tour of the world, in the course of which he again traversed Manchuria, from south to north, passing through the very center of military operations. His experiences form a remarkably interesting and timely story. The photographs are taken by Mr. North specially for this article.]

HAVING completed my intended survey of civil and military life in Japan, Korea, and Manchuria, the most difficult problem of my whole tour now presented itself, that of going from Japanese authority in New-Chang into the Russian lines at Moukden; and after inspecting military affairs there, returning to America by way of the great Trans-Siberian Railroad, Moscow, St. Petersburg and London. Four years ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave a brief account of my experiences at Igovestchensk, on the Amur River, during the Boxer Chinese war, when I went through Siberia and around the globe from west to east. If the journey was exciting then, it was even more so now.

Hon. H. R. Miller, American Consul at New-Chwang, told me that my undertaking of getting into the Russian lines at Moukden would be exceedingly hazardous, if indeed, it could be accomplished at all. He would not assume any official responsibility in advising me how to proceed. If I should attempt to board the railway train going to Moukden by the direct route through Liao-Yang, the Japanese would certainly arrest me and perhaps transport me back to Japan. Edwin Emerson, war correspondent of the New York World, told me that he had been through the lines to Liao-Yang and Moukden; but it was at the expense of all his photographs, private papers, money, passport, camera and all his baggage. He barely escaped with his life. Nothing was heard of him for many days, and it was reported in Chefoo, Tientsin, and Peking, while I was there, that he had been shot as a spy by the Russians.

There was, at that time, another way by which traders and Chinese reached Moukden. They went around the two armies west, on the train from New-Chwang to Kaopontze, thence north to H-sin-min-tun, the terminus of a spur of the Chinese Imperial Railroad, parallel to the Liao River, though several miles west of it, and of the two contending armies; thence by Chinese cart, on horseback, or on foot, about fifty miles east, through bottom-lands, across the Liao-Lio, over the bluffs, through the land-breaks; and through vast millet fields to Moukden. The whole country round about H-sin-min-tun and the Liao River was infested with Chinese robbers and murderers called Hunghoozas.

A third way to enter the Russian empire was across the Mongolian desert, nearly one thousand miles to Kaikhta, thence across Lake Baikal to the Trans-siberian Railroad. Everybody considered it impossible to go to Moukden by the direct route; all agreed that the second was the most dangerous, and that the third route required five weeks of privation and fatigue in the desert. Determined to inspect Russia's civil and military affairs in Manchuria, as I had already inspected Japan's, I resolved to try the second route, though repeatedly informed that it lay directly through the worst nest of Hunghoozas in all Manchuria. Hon. E. H. Conger, our Minister to the Celestial Empire at Peking, assured me that I would not be allowed to enter any part of Manchuria where the Russian army had control; that several correspondents and others—a returning missionary, whose home had been in Moukden for more than a dozen years, among the number—had made the attempt, but in every case they were sent back. The Russian Minister at Peking said that he would not authorize any one to enter Russia by way of Manchuria, and accordingly, disregarding my request, he attached his visa to my passport, "via Kaikhta," as the place for me to enter the Russian empire, which afterwards caused me considerable trouble.

In New-Chwang there were Hunghoozas, and many "crooks," who sympathized with and harbored the robbers. Arson, robbery, and murder would have been committed, but for the presence of soldiers who policed the city. Foreign business men, and especially merchants, feared there would be general pillage between the time of Russian evacuation and Japanese occupation. In fact, bandits came down the Liao River, expecting to plunder the city, but from the going away of the Russians in the morning, to the coming of the Japanese in the afternoon, there was so little time, that the reign of terror had only commenced, by firing the town-hall, and attacking a few citizens, when it was subdued. So quickly did the military government of New-Chwang pass from Russian to Japanese, that the citizens scarcely realized the change, except for the presence of Japanese soldiery in the streets, war vessels in the river, and the blown-up Russian gunboat which was destroyed as they left the city, and now was visible at low tide, half out of the water, like the Russian ships I had seen a few days before at Chemulpo.

Rev. John Carson, from Belfast, the resident Presbyterian missionary, told me that the presence of Japanese soldiers in New-Chwang was preferable to that of the Russians. In the course of our conversation, he said: "Right over the wall of this compound, there in the cemetery, is the newly-made grave of one of your American correspondents, who was shot by Chinese soldiers." This bit of information did not make me over anxious to commence my intended expedition among Siberian Railroad. Everybody considered it impossible to go to Moukden by the direct route; all agreed that the second was the most dangerous, and that the third route required five weeks of privation and fatigue in the desert. Determined to inspect Russia's civil and military affairs in Manchuria, as I had already in-the Hunghoozas and their friends, the Chinese soldiers. Anticipating that I might be arrested and searched by the Russians as soon as I should appear in front of their lines, and perhaps be taken as a spy, I sent all my photographs, note-books and valuable papers to America before leaving New-Chwang. The Japanese detectives, thinking I intended returning to Peking, required only my name, address and nationality, as I took the westbound train out of New-Chwang. Nearly all the passengers were Chinese, both on the main line and on the branch, most of them third-class, in open, flat cars. At Li-chia-no-pang, Yao-yang-ho, Pai-chi-pu, and at all other stations on the railroad to H-sin-min-tun, there was a squad of about twenty Chinese soldiers drawn up in line on the platform, and they came to present arms as the train arrived. These soldiers have loose-fitting, blue cotton uniform, straw hats and rifles, but they do not possess the martial bearing of the Japanese.

At H-sin-min-tun, the terminus of the line, there was a great crowd—Chinese soldiers, coolies, freighters and others—but there was no station-house, nor even a roof over the bags of grain and other freight, which I saw piled up along the switch tracks. Not speaking Chinese, I found difficulty in securing a place to lodge, and in making arrangements to cross the country to Moukden, until I met a kind-hearted Red Cross Chinaman, who had lived in Tientsin and learned some English. He conducted me through this typical Chinese town.

Six dollars was the ordinary hire for a Chinaman and his mule cart to Moukden, but all the drivers now charged twelve dollars. I inquired the cause of doubling the regular price, and was told that three Russian travelers had been killed by Hunghoozas, near the crossing of the Liao, the night before, directly on our intended course to Moukden. Further inquiry revealed the fact that in a rugged hill, which I could plainly see a few miles north of H-sin-min-tun, there was a camp of three hundred Hunghoozas, of whom nineteen were Japanese. Their commander-in-chief had served as colonel in the Chinese army, and had fought the Japanese in 1894. I tried to hire several different Chinamen to take me out to this camp of Hunghoozas, but each replied that there would be great risk of losing one's life if he should approach their camp.

Two mules tandem were hitched to that most uncomfortable of all vehicles, the Chinese cart, my two valises were put inside, and taking my seat opposite the driver, my feet hanging down, we started out briskly on the Moukden road, intending to overtake some traders who were going to the same destination. But a load of merchandise, drawn by eight mules ahead of us, got stuck in Manchurian clay mud, such as impedes the artillery of both armies, and we could not pass, until with shovels, cruel whipping, and awful cursing for an hour, the men finally extricated the load. The roads were so rough and the cart so abominable, that I preferred to walk much of the way, enduring a ride in the cart only when footsore and tired out. A man on horseback with army rifle and side arms, dressed very much as a Chinese soldier, asked to be my guard, in the same manner as the armed Bedouin escorts travelers from Jerusalem down to Jericho and the Dead Sea. When I declined his services, he rode on ahead. His appearance was suspicious. I must confess that I feared highwaymen. About noon, we came to the right bank of the Liao River, and I was glad to see the Greek traders who had started out in the morning ahead of us. They had traded with the soldiers and people in South Africa during the Boer War. At the ferry there were eating booths, where the natives sold melons, fish, meat, bread and drink. An old scow boat, poled by Chinese, took us and our carts across the muddy river. My driver did not seem to know how to make our mules swim with those of the Greek traders; so, after exhausting ourselves to no purpose, trying to chase the mules into the water, they were ferried over. All baggage was boated over, but the mules (excepting our two) swam across, at times nothing but their heads or noses being visible above the water.

I recognized the armed guard whom we saw in the morning, crossing the ferry with his rifle strapped on his back. He was eating a piece of melon, when, with my pocket kodak, I photographed him standing on the scow. To me his appearance was peculiar. One of our mules ran away and before we could catch him, the Greek traders, who did not appear afraid of regular soldiers or bushwackers, had hitched up their teams and started on. The fellow with the gun and side-arms, mounting his horse, started on a road that turned to the right, through millet fields, and told my driver to follow him; but as I was on foot, I motioned him to follow me along the main road taken by the traders.

At some distance east of the river, we came to the hills overlooking a long stretch of the Liao River valley, north and south. Here we met the pickets of the Russian cavalry, and were immediately ordered into the camp, some half a mile further up. As soon as the colonel saw the armed Chinaman who pretended to be a guard, he ordered him disarmed and confined in the Russian camp, subsequently telling me that the fellow undoubtedly belonged to the Hunghooza gang. I felt sure that if the fellow were proven one of the robber band, he would be shot without any unnecessary delay.

The passports of the Greek traders being regular, their cases were quickly disposed of, but I was politely conducted to other quarters still further up the hill, and critically, though gently, examined by the colonel. He required me to tell him each step in my journey there, and explain why I proposed returning to America via Manchuria and Russia.

"What did you see in Yokohama and Tokio that was peculiar to these war times?" he asked. "I suppose you are a correspondent and have a kodak. You will not be allowed to take any photographs east of the Ural Mountains," he continued. "You see," he said, "Russia now has on her hands the greatest war in her history. In the two opposing armies, there are more than half a million men in the field in Manchuria. We cannot insure the safety of travelers."

When his adjutant called attention to the fact that the Russian minister at Peking had vised my passport "via Kaikhta," I thought further progress towards Moukden was at an end. But I continued to answer all his questions, and to show him other papers, written in Russian, explaining my mission as "educational and scientific," and that my work required my return to New York by the quickest route. I did not tell him that I had visited Russian prisoners in Japan, had seen the Japanese military schools, hospitals, and army in the field. The colonel finally said:

RUSSIAN GUARDS ON THE MANCHURIAN R.R.

"Your answers are so frank and your appearance so trustworthy, I shall send you under cavalry escort to the commandant at Moukden, and if he sends you to me, I shall have you escorted to H-sin-min-tun. Your passport, other documents and my letter of explanation will be taken to Moukden under seal by the order. I suggested that he request for me a personal interview with the commandant. I went out from the colonel's quarters with a light heart, for, under the protection of Russian regulars, I had no more fear of Chinese brigands, and I felt confident the commandant at Moukden would permit the liberty I desired.

During the rest of the day, that night and the next day, I was with the kindhearted and accommodating Russian soldiers. They shared with me their bread, tea and hard tack, and took of my white bread, sugar and Chinese cakes. I bought watermelons and cucumbers from the natives, and the soldiers took what they wanted without paying for them. For their horses' fodder, and eggs for themselves, they paid a small amount. Russian soldiers are poorly paid.

About nine that night, we bivouacked in an old, deserted Chinese hostelry. After partaking of our bread and boiled eggs, and stationing a guard inside, and one outside the enclosure, we lay down to sleep on new-mown hay, with our blankets over us. The night was clear and cool, and I wrapped myself in my light overcoat. Two of the soldiers slept in a hayrack, where the horses were feeding.

Awaking at break of day, I saw a soldier kindling the fire for breakfast with dry millet stalks, which were about the size of our stalks of Indian corn, and used extensively for fuel in Manchuria. I noticed that our camp in the morning contained twice as many soldiers as had come with us from the cavalry outpost, near the Liao River; but I did not know from whence the additional troop came, nor whither they intended going, nor did I ask.

Our escort from this bivouac up to Moukden was composed of an entirely new set of troopers. The fertile and productive region through which we traveled might well be compared to Sangamon county, Illinois, except in the kind of crops. Whether the Russian or Japanese army occupies this part of Manchuria during the coming winter, neither men nor horses will go hungry. The whole country, from Peking to Harbin, a distance of seven hundred miles, is filled with breadstuffs, fodder, cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, dairy products, horses and mules. All army supplies bring double price in Manchuria, and the natives are getting rich fast. There is plenty of money in Manchuria, brought there by the two armies, and people generally, except in cases where property is destroyed, are doing the war has come. They serve either army with the same alacrity, and receive good pay for any kind of service.

Both armies are spending money freely. I have seen many herds of cattle, horses and mules, bought up by the government agents, driven into the vast army camps. The natives are using every available means of transportation to carry hay and fodder to the army horses—carts, wagons, mule-backs, and even coolies, are pressed into the service.

Some time before we reached Moukden we could see the towers of the pagan temples of that city, and the railway station, which is two miles from the west gate. I shall never forget the scenes that presented themselves as we came within the jurisdiction of the great Russian army. Thousands upon thousands of soldiers accoutered for battle, horses, artillery, long trains of cars on the numerous side tracks, Russian flags, masses of white tents, whistling locomotives, storehouses being constructed, coolies laying ties for more side-tracks, loads of ammunition, Red Cross tents, bakery ovens, officers on horseback and in droskies, trains arriving loaded with heavily armed men, gendarmes, Chinese carts and jinrikishas, were a few of the many scenes before us, as we drove up to the railway station.

There were three of us whose passports and presence at the seat of war must be investigated by the commandant on the morrow—Russians are proverbial for deferring business until "to-morrow." We were then it then appeared, destined to remain all night on the hard benches of the station waiting-room, under guard of two Russian soldiers, and the writer was to have subsequent experience in Moukden, which might well be considered "the experience of a lifetime." That experience will be told in my next letter.

Neglected Altars Restored

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON
BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

AN ORIENTAL TREASURY

SOLILOQUY of King Joash: "I am now thirty years of age, and I have been the reigning King of Judah for twenty-three years. And this is the gladdest day of all my reign thus far, because it marks the completion of the restoration of the Temple of God. I have come aside to my bedchamber at the close of the day, that I may think it all over alone. I recall my childhood days when I played among the fallen stones, which made good hiding-places for me. And then the time came when I began to ask questions of my uncle, the high-priest Jehoiada, and my aunt, Jehosheba. Where is my mother? Where is my father? Why is this place all broken down? Will I always live here? I remember that neither my uncle nor my aunt told me the terrible secret of my life until they had determined upon my crowning day, on my twentieth birthday. But they made for me a happy childhood. 'My young soul was strongly stirred by the answers they gave me in reply to my questions about the Temple being broken down, as they pointed to the temple of Baal near by, and told me that wicked men had taken the stones away from God's home to build the temple to the idol god. And my uncle used to say: 'Some day you and I will bring them back again.' And I never tired of hearing him tell over and over again how we would build up God's House. It is all pictured in my childish imagination, and became a part of me."

1. Restore the Church Altar. Two influences caused the decay of the Temple in the days of Athaliah. One was her in vicious Baalism, and the other was the cowardice of God's people. The Temple was not more broken down than the cowardly worshippers. So to-day, when church edifices are more beautiful than ever before, the real church, membership, is in many places badly broken down, caring more for money, pleasure, and politics, than for God and the good of men. A wide stretch of ground near an English manor house is carefully planted with larches, and firs, and cedars. But the owner, busy in London, failed to safeguard them against the sting nettles, bramble sprays, and hawthorn, that grew all about the young trees in the second summer, and smothered them. When the owner came back from London in the autumn of the second year, there was scarcely anything to be seen but dead trees, killed by the titles and neglect. So the spiritual life of some churches is being smothered with aggressive euchre, and dances, and clubs (Mark 4: 18, 19). To save the church to-day, we must not only give money, but time, and thought, and love to God and man.

Give strength, give thought, give deeds,
Give love, give tears, and give thyself;
Give, give, be always giving,
Who gives not, is not living,
The more we give, the more we live.

There is no place in our modern church—more in need of repairs than the family pew," from which the children of the family are conspicuously absent. I wonder young men drop out of the churches altogether when they drop out of the Sunday School, having never been accustomed to attend church. "As long as my boy sits at my table he must sit in my pew," said a father whom we may assign to the old school—a wise school, was not? Senator Hoar, a man of liberal thought in matters of religion, deplored, in a public address, the laxity of discipline which has followed the softening of old, rigid lines. He would see the boys and girls in the pew with their parents every Sunday.

In one of Dr. Torrey's recent evangelistic meetings in England, a baby cried in the audience, and the parents prepared to leave. Dr. Torrey saw it, and stopped his sermon long enough to say: "That baby is not disturbing any one. I am glad you brought it; I wish you would bring more of the babies." It so happened that the father of the baby was a earnest Christian, but his wife was unconverted. He had begged his wife to accompany him to the meeting. She said: "I canna' go, here are all the bairns." Her husband replied, "Press the bairns, and I'll take them along." Accordingly, the bairns were dressed, and taken along, and through Dr. Torrey's kindly patience, remained through the meeting. The mother's heart was touched. She was convicted of sin, and when the invitation was given, she went forward while her husband stayed with the bairns. There is great room for tact and patience in winning souls.

We are startled to read that in some of the state churches of New England, and in former times in this country, unconverted nisters were assigned to churches. Why should it not be equally strange for a church to have unspiritual people engaged in its choir, teaching in the Sunday School or enrolled on the membership list? One of our best hymns, written by an English rector, Rev. Henry Francis Lyte, was written after he had been summoned to the death-bed of a low minister, who then realized that he was not a Christian. But the preacher called to comfort him, was also forced to confess he was in the same condition. They both turned to God for help, and not in vain. The new life in Christ of Lyte, poured itself out in the hymn

Jesus, my cross have taken,
All to leave and follow thee.

Surely that should be the spirit of every leader of Church life! In Africa, about Lake Victoria, tens of thousands of people are dying of the "sleeping sickness." The disease seems to be scattered by a tsetse fly, but no antidote has been discovered. The victim falls into a sleep that lasts from six weeks to two years. Alas, there are thousands of churches and church people dying of the "sleeping sickness" in a form that attacks not the body but the soul! How much better that the Church and its members should illustrate the new and wonderful radiance, being so filled with the divine spirit, that radiations of noble inspiration to right living shall be felt by all around! These x-rays, discovered by M. Augustin Charpentier, are given off from muscles and nerves of men and animals. When we speak, these lustrous rays increase about the skull, and vary as the voice is high or low. When the arm is contracted, these luminescent rays are intensified in the cervical enlargement of the cord. Even attention and intense thought increase the rays. Really more wonderful, though not a new discovery, is the radiant influence of Christian thoughts and words and deeds, such as should abound in every church.

2. Restore the Family Altar. Even more serious than the dilapidated condition of the family pew, is that of the family altar in many professedly Christian homes. Nothing will do so much to keep out knots of strife from the web of home life, as a daily family altar. Nothing will be more likely to check tendencies to sin in sons and daughters, even when they have gone from home, than memories of family worship. In a "Sailors' Haven," there was a concert one night, a very poor one, but after it came a few Gospel songs, preceding the collection. One of these songs was Awake, my soul, stretch every nerve

THE KING'S SCRIBE AND THE HIGH PRIEST CAME UP AND TOLD THE MONEY

And press with vigor on
A heavenly race demands thy zeal,
And an immortal crown.

After this came the collection and benediction. The missionary in charge expected only a few pennies, but on counting the collection, found on the card of a young millionaire, whose presence he had not recognized, a pledge of $15,000. The missionary in going for it asked how the giver was prompted to make so large an offering. He replied: "It was that hymn, 'Awake, my soul.' Twenty years ago, when I was a boy, my grandmother used to sing it; she used to hum it as she went about the house; and when I heard it last night, it flashed over me that my soul needed waking up. Grandmother's hymn did it." The hymns of the home have wrought many such an awakening in fulfillment of the promise: "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." Let us store the memory with shields from the family altar.

3. Restore the Personal Altar. Daily private prayer at opening and close of day is possible anywhere, and is our duty and privilege everywhere. A young sailor in the navy was remarked on for his calmness and presence of mind in his first battle. "How was it, my lad," asked an officer next day, "that you were ready for everything yesterday? You moved about as quietly as if you were by your mother's fire-side, though so brisk." "Please, sir, it was because I was alone with my God for half an hour the night before the battle began." "Impossible, surely," said his questioner. "There was such hurrying to and fro the whole time. I never saw more going on, on both decks." "Yes, sir, but it is true. I finished my duties; then I was alone with my God in the crown of my cap."

Browning notes as an object of awe, the man who really prays:

The man sprang to his feet, stood erect, caught at God's skirts,
And played, so was I afraid.

But the man who really prays is not himself afraid even of an Athaliah. He will be true to his faith in face of want and death. At Ningpo, China, some missionaries were preaching with colored pictures. A company of native basket-makers heard of the pictures and went. The theme was the story of the Prodigal Son, and they heard for the first time of a Father-God, of pardoning love. Three stayed to hear more, and came again and again, till their neighbors said: "They are turning Christians," and began to persecute them. Two were turned back, but one, Neng-Knei, stood firm.

"You will not work on Sunday?" exclaimed his employer. "Well, you will lose your pay." This meant the sacrifice of at least a third of Neng-Knei's little income. His master did not particularly object, knowing that the clever workman could do all that was to be done in six days labor where another man would have taken seven. The wages had been low enough before—only two pence a day and his food; but now he had, out of his reduced receipts, the extra expense of purchasing provisions for Sunday, which could not cost less than two or three pence. The busy season came round, and Neng-Knei found himself one morning at the house of some grandees. The simple Christian workman stood in the audience hall. There was a sound of approaching footsteps, a rustle of silken garments, and through the curtained archway entered a dainty group—the great ladies of the house. "You are the basket-maker?" Their directions were soon given. Incense-burners were required, which Neng-Knei was to make. "I can not!" replied the man. "I am a Christian, and no longer worship idols. I cannot make or sell anything for idolatrous purposes." Amusement followed surprise. Can it be that a poor basket-maker has a conscience opposed to his own interests? They asked him many questions, and Neng-Knei made the best of his opportunity to tell the story of the Cross. They did not seem much interested, soon grew tired of listening, and tripped away. "What was that you were saying?" Neng-Knei looked round, and met a searching glance, half incredulous, half expectant, wholly earnest. A man in working clothes was standing by him. "You did not see me? I am painting here," he said. "What was it you were saying? I heard, but tell it once more." The good seed of the kingdom had found here its "good ground."

Jesus saw the poor widow put two mites into the Temple treasury (Luke 21). There are two mites that each one of us should bring:

There is one great lesson that should make strong and vivid our personal faith that stands out in this story, and that is the fact that God's Church and God's truth survive all the Athaliahs, and Jezebels, and Voltaires, and Tom Paines that attack it.

Last eve I paused beside a blacksmith's door,
And heard the anvil ring the vesper chime;
Then looking in I saw upon the floor
Old hammers worn with beating years of time.
"How many anvils have you had," said I,
"To wear and batter all these hammers so?"
"Just one," he answered; then with twinkling eye,
"The anvil wears the hammers out you know."
And so I thought the anvil of God's Word
For ages sceptic blows have beat upon;
Yet, though the noise of Paine, Voltaire was heard,
The anvil is unworn—the hammers gone.

The Gentle Life

II. TIMOTHY 2: 24:
"BE GENTLE UNTO ALL MEN"

THE great moral leaveners of the world have used but little blasting powder. They are not past-masters in the "High Order of Babbling Quarrelers." Like the laborers, lifting higher and higher the walls of Solomon's temple in Jerusalem, they make but little noise. They tread the pathway of life with feet, for the most part, sandaled in velvet. Their voice is not an angry growl, but a dulcet whisper. Their breath is not cyclonic, but a summer zephyr. Their countenances are not twisted with the demoniac passions of a Hogarth's caricature. Their eyes are not flashing with the lightnings of a Mediterranean euroclydon. They are red lippered, and laughing eyed, and rosy cheeked, and with tender touch, with the happy smile of a glorious June sunrise. They believe not in hurling storm-cloud against storm-cloud, until the deluge comes and the bridges are swept away and the harvest fields are battered down, as though two mighty armies had turned the valleys into a gigantic battlefield, where the heavens were resounding with the cannonading of the elements. But they believe in the "Gentle Life." They believe in the golden pulleys of evaporation, gathering up the waters into the reservoirs of the clouds, to be scattered abroad in the blessed refreshment of April showers. They believe in the gentler means, which produce life, and not in the fierce, passionate methods of the iconoclast, the anarchist and the fire-brand, which destroy life.

Nature's Gentle Processes

Nature has her storms, eruptions and earthquakes, which in her angry moods carry death and destruction in their path, but the gentle ways are always used by nature to accomplish her greatest good. Standing upon a ship's deck some day, I say, "Where did yonder tall, straight mast come from?" "Why," you say, "hundreds of years ago, a bird was flying over the Maine hills towards her nest, with a little seed in her mouth. The keen eye of a hawk spied her. When the hawk began to soar higher and higher in the heavens, that he might make one terrific plunge upon his prey, the little bird saw him. Before she fled to safety, she gave one little frightened cry. When she uttered that cry, her bill opened and the seed dropped to the ground. A gentle wind blew up the valley and covered over that seed with a little soil. A little shower then came and moistened that soil, and the little seed began to sprout. It took root. It grew into a bush. It grew up into a sapling. It rounded out into a great big tree. One day a Maine lumberman came through that valley. With his axe he marked that tree for the shipyard. The tree was cut down. It was dragged to the river and floated down to the saw-mill. It was scraped and fixed for a mast. When this ship was launched that tree was fitted in its present place for man's use. Nature developed that tree, not in the upheavals of a day, but by the gentle ways of maturing years.

"What will become of that tree?" "Why," you answer, "by the same gentle means with which that seed was changed into a tree, nature will also change that tree into something else. Perhaps, next week or next month, there will be a storm. This ship will roll and tumble in the trough of the sea and threaten to founder. The captain, in order to lighten the ship, will put his trumpet to his lips and cry, 'Cut away the mast.' When the boat gives a lurch to leeward, over will go the mast. That mast will float around the sea, until after awhile it will become water-logged. Then it will sink to the ocean's bottom. Then the waters will cover over that log with submarine deposits. Years later, that log will be changed into coke. Then, by a gentle process, the coke will be

Changed into Coal

Then, years later, the bed of that ocean, by certain changes, will be lifted. The submerged continent, which now lies buried between Africa and America, again may be raised above the waters and toss back its wet locks and put on another crown of green foliage. Then the miners, with their pickaxes will begin to dig out the coal. They will come to the old tree now changed into coal. This tree as coal will then be thrown into the open grate of some home, to be built a thousand years hence. Then about that burning coal another Ik Marvel may have his reveries, or perhaps before its glow two young lovers may plight their troth, while the flames leap and sputter and laugh at the old, old story which they hear—that old, old story of love, which is ever new. As nature gently and quietly changes the seed into a bush, and the bush into a sapling, and the sapling into a great tree, so it will gently change the tree into coke, and the coke into coal.

Nature deals gently with her own in her wonder-workings. Paul, the old Gospel veteran, tells young Timothy, who is about to succeed him, to deal in the same gentle way with the human trees he is about to try to develop into spiritual maturity. Paul practically says: "Kindness, and gentleness, and love will accomplish far more for Christ than hate, or bitterness, or fault-finding." The old Psalmist cried out in rapture, "Thy gentleness hath made me great." May we, by Gospel gentleness, make others great, even as Christ's gentleness can make us great.

Be Gentle at Home

The gentle life of the Christian must be manifested toward those with whom we come into closest contact. We first of all should be gentle to our parents, our wives, our husbands, and children, and brothers, and sisters, and home associates. We should be gentle when we arise in the morning, and prepare for the breakfast table; be gentle when we are fixing the children for school; be gentle when we kiss our wives good-bye as we start for the train; be gentle when we come home at night from the store; be very gentle when we tuck away the little ones into their beds for the night. For it is by the gentle words, the gentle deeds, and the gentle memories that we hold our greatest influence over our dear ones, and not by the rebukes and the censoriousness of our bitter tongues.

The old proverb teaches: "One warm sunshiny May day can woo more buds out of the trees and bushes, than five months of winter frosts can ever accomplish." One word of gentleness can accomplish more for good in the lives of our dear ones, than a thousand angry looks can ever do. You know that your mother's smile, your mother's kiss, and your mother's sweet ways, were the greatest magnets which made you try to do right. They were not your father's punishments and sharp rebukes. You know that your wife's gentle ways have far more influence for good over the lives of your little children than your sharp corrections, although your wife rarely lifts a hand to strike them a blow. Why, only last week this fact was illustrated to you in an emphatic way. You told your boy not to do a certain act. You told him not to go to a neighbor's house. He went. When you came home you found it out. You were angry. You said to yourself: "I will make that boy mind me, if I have to whip him for his disobedience." You took him to your room and thrashed him. Did that whipping do any good? Not a particle. The same angry look which flashed from your eyes, flashed from his. The same set lines which drew down the corners of your mouth, drew down his. He did not cry, he did not even whimper. He took his punishment in dogged silence, and then he sullenly went to his room.

There is an old saying that all the natures of the wild and the domestic beasts are caged up in every man's heart. It only depends upon which cage you open, which nature will dominate the man. In the heart's menagerie are the jackal, the lion, the tiger, the swine, and the lamb, and all other kinds of four-legged beasts. That whipping which you gave your boy only developed the mulish part of his nature. He became obstinate and ugly. The more you beat him, the more obstinate and mulish he grew. The rod and the rebuke never made your child bend his will to your will.

Gentle with the Children

But what happened when your wife went to your boy's room? Ah! she recaged the snarling tiger and the kicking mule in his heart. She let free the lamb of his better nature. When she first went in, his eyes were blazing with rage. His teeth were gritting together. His hands were clenched. He was rapidly walking up and down the room. Up and down he went. When your wife first entered, he would not look at her. But up and down he walked, up and down. Then he said: "Mother, I am going to leave home. I am not going to college. I am not going to let father give me another cent. I am too big to be whipped, and he might as well know it now and once for all. Mother, I hate him! I hate father, because I know father has no love for me!" What did your wife do? Did she begin to scold? Oh, no. She simply went up to her boy and put her arm lovingly around his neck, and said "Harry, why Harry! Are you going to leave me? Would you leave your mother? Oh, my boy, you know not what you are saying!" The boy started. The tears began to flow. He never even whimpered under your blows, but with his mother, he just sobbed like a little child. Then she took his head upon her breast, and began to gently talk to him. She told him how anxious you were to see him grow up to be good and true and brave. She told him that you had a right to expect obedience from him, and that it grieved you to have to punish him. And while she talked, his heart melted, and he was as soft as wax in her hand. That night, in the quietude of your room, your wife said:

"Husband, never strike that boy again. You will regret the day that you do. You can get Harry to do anything, if you are only gentle with him. But strike him and some day he will either strike you back, or leave home in anger forever."

We all know that it is only by gentleness we have our greatest influence over our loved ones. Yet, strange to say, when anything goes wrong at the store, or the home, and we lose our tempers, we nearly always turn our anger against our own children, or our own wives, or our own husbands, or our own brothers and sisters. If the cook is mean and suddenly leaves us the lurch, or the laundryman ruins our best wash dress, or we become fatigued from the spring or the fall house-cleaning, or our clerks cheat us at the store, then we are very apt to vent our displeasure upon our helpless children, or our wives or husbands, who have done nothing. The domestic squalls and upheavals are often due entirely to outside causes, and not to inside dissensions. Now, my friends, let us, one and all, learn to guard against speaking harsh words against those we love. Let us deal gently with those who are by our side, and who are bound to us by the strong ties of domestic affections.

Deal Kindly with Foes

Remember that in the influence of the "Gentle Life" in the home, we can serve God just as truly in the small things and in the little duties as in the great. "In the effort to appreciate various forms of greatness," wrote Edward Howard Gregg, "we must not undervalue the value of a simple, good life. Just to be good; to keep life pure from degrading elements; make it constantly helpful in little ways to those who are touched by it; to keep one's spirit always sweet and avoid all manner of petty anger and irritability, that is an ideal, as noble as it is difficult." But that is an ideal which God will let us all reach, if we daily try to him in prayer. That is an ideal we all should try to reach. For in order to have our loved ones spiritually sweet, we must set them an example and avoid all manner of petty anger and irritability. We ourselves must learn by practice to be true types of the Christian's "Gentle Life."

Deal gently with father, mother, husband, wife, brother, sister and child. Yes, but the text goes farther than this. It bids us deal gently with those who are fighting us and our work, because they do not see conditions as we see them. We should deal gently with our enemies, as well as our friends, with our detractors as well as our supporters, with our defamers as with those who are doing all they can to destroy us. In the great coliseum of the world's struggles, we should never do as did the ancient aristocrats, brutalized by the spectacle of the gladiatorial combat. When a victor in one of these fierce fights had beaten his foe to the earth, he looked up to the spectators for a signal to tell him if his prostrate enemy was to be killed or have mercy shown him. Then even women, so far from getting the tenderness of their sex, as to turn down the thumbs, which was the signal to finish the wounded man. We should always lift our thumbs up. We should never give the signal, "To destroy." We should signal always "To save," no matter how much the prostrate foe may hate us and our work. If this Pauline commandment bids young Timothy to be gentle with his friends, it also commands him to deal gently with his enemies.

Long Memories

Thousands of men are ready to say they will be kind and gentle to their friends. They are not ready, however, to say they will be kind and forgiving to the enemies. They pride themselves upon the fact that they are good lovers. They also pride themselves upon the fact that they are "good haters." If a man does them a kindness, they store that fact away in the most secure treasure-room of the "Temple of Memory." They will wait if need be ten, twenty, thirty or even for years to pay back that kindness. I was reading the other day of a noted Eastern politician whom William C. Whitney many years ago befriended. This politician, when a young man, stood under the shadow of the penitentiary walls. Whitney came to his rescue. Twenty-five years later, William C. Whitney was mightily in need of a certain help. He went to the man and asked it. This famous politician turned and said: "Whitney, I have been waiting for nearly thirty years for the chance to repay you for that kindness you once did me. Now the chance has come. I never forget a friend." He at once came to Whitney's rescue. But though some people never forget a friend, on the other hand, others never forgive an injury done by an enemy. They may have to abide their time a quarter, or even half a century, but when

Chicago's Tent Campaign Closed

EXPERIENCE and observation taught the late Evangelist Moody that the summer is the best time for aggressive effort in reaching the masses, especially in the large cities. As far back as 1886, he delivered an address in the city of Chicago before business men, which led to the organization of the Chicago Evangelization Society, the purpose of which was to evangelize the needier districts by means of tent meetings, open-air work, and house-to-house visitation. This was the origin of the work which has since grown into the Moody Bible Institute for city, line, and foreign missions.

Mr. Moody's aims and policies are still adhered to, and during the past summer the Institute has had in operation two tents and a Gospel wagon. The tent campaign opened the middle of June, and closed when the cold wet weather set in, about the middle of September. The capacity of one tent was 1,000, and of the other 500 people. They were pitched in five different localities. Gospel wagon meetings, and open-air meetings were held in co-operation with them, thus reaching thousands on the street corners who could not be induced to come inside a tent.

Among the prominent speakers who took part in the campaign were Rev. James M. Gray, D.D., of Boston; Evangelist S. H. Hadley and Rev. John Elliott, D.D., of New York; Rev. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast, Ireland; Rev. W. E. Biederwolf, of Monticello, Ind., in addition to local pastors and Christian workers, including Mr. Tom Mackey, Mr. Norman H. Camp, Evangelist E. R. Dow, and A. P. Fitt. Singing was made a special feature of all the meetings, under the leadership of Prof. D. B. Towner and others. The students of the Moody Bible Institute assisted throughout in the singing, personal work and visitation. The estimated number of persons who attended inside the tent meetings were 17,621 in 226 meetings; 305 persons made definite public confession of Christ as their Saviour and Lord.

The usual programme was: General meetings, every evening; children's meetings, from Tuesday to Friday afternoons (inclusive); women's meetings, one afternoon each week; and men's meetings, Sunday afternoons. Some incidents of the campaign, showing the results are given below:

One evening at the close of a service, a gentleman who was in a careless state concerning his soul's salvation, though his wife was a Christian, said to a worker: "I intend to go home and fight right with God."

The benediction had been pronounced, and the man was standing in the passage-way with a baby in his arms, and shaking hands with the worker to whom he had just made the above remark. Another worker came up, and having heard what was said, asked:

"Brother, how do you know you will ever get home? Life is too uncertain to figure on future conditions. Why not settle this all-important question now?"

And standing in the aisle, with the baby in his arms, he said:

"I will. God helping me, I will." This man's will was backed up by the power of God, and night after night his testimony gladdened the hearts of all in the tent.

About the 1st of August, while the Institute crew were conducting open-air meetings on the corner of Thirty-first and Halsted Streets, a man, young in years but old in sin—a husband and father—came along and heard the songs, heard the Gospel, and followed the young men to the tent. He became interested, and was spoken to by a Christian worker the first night, but gave no sign of conviction. He came a second night, and a third, and a fourth. He apparently drank in everything that was said, appreciated all with interest, the different speakers and singers—but made no move. The fifth night his wife and two children also came. On the third night after the wife raised her hand for prayer, and was encouraged to stand with others to be prayed for and with. While she was standing the direct invitation was pointed at the husband: "Won't you stand with her, that your home may not be divided?"—and he stood. They were both personally dealt with by workers, and were both saved.

In one of the after meetings, an attractive and intelligent young woman arose and said: "Two weeks ago, I was going by this tent on the way to a theatre, and heard the singing and came in. I had been a nominal Christian before, and a member of a church, but I did not know Christ as my Saviour until I found him here. Since then I have had the happiest two days of my life;" and her face gave evidence of the genuineness of her testimony.

One night a gentleman gave a dollar for eight colportage books for free distribution, and one of the workers sent two of these books into a home by a young girl who had raised her hand for prayer. The home was that of an excommunicated Catholic family.

Through the study of these two books the family was led to come to the tent, and three young ladies gave their hearts to the Lord Jesus Christ. The mother attended many of the meetings, and professed to be a Christian.

These are only a few of the many cases reached by the Tent Campaign.

A GREAT GOSPEL GATHERING UNDER CANVAS

At a time comes they are as vindictive as though the worst injury was of yesterday. Now, my text emphatically says: "Deal gently with friends. Deal gently with the enemy also." Love those who love you. Yes. But love those who hate you and ill-treat you and despise you. That is the commandment of my text also.

Dare you disobey God's orders to deal gently with those who have done you an injury? If you do, God will make you rue your defiance in more ways than one. The "Sword of Hate" is two-edged and keener than any Damascus blade. With one stroke it slays a foe; but when the swordsman draws forth the "Blade of Vengeance," whetted with the mortal blood of his dying enemy, this sword springs back with its unused edge, and slays the vindictive swordsman also. Two lives are generally destroyed. With a bludgeon you can knock a man down. With a keen, cutting speech, you can make him wilt, and compel him to curse you under his breath. But the sharp word, the bitter word, the sarcastic word never yet changed a foe into a friend. Now, my text demands that you shall try to destroy your foes, not by crushing them, but by winning them to your ranks. You are to destroy them, even as Napoleon, on his escape from Elba, made Marshal Ney and his grenadiers fall at his feet, because they felt he loved them. You are to destroy them by dealing gently with them, by forgiving, as well as forgetting the ills of the past.

But greater sweep than the establishment of harmonious relationships with our personal enemies, has the application of my text. We should try to bring back to Christ those who are at war with their Divine Master on account of their sins. We should try to lead God's wayward children back to their Divine Father's home, even as the prodigal of the far country was led back to the old homestead. No man can truly love Christ, unless, at the same time, by yearning, tender affection, he is willing to go forth to save sinners, even as he would want to save one of his own children.

To bring the lost sheep back to the Shepherd's fold ought to be the highest wish and desire of every Christian. And that is not to be done by menaces and denunciation. God, as Elijah found, is not in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in "the still small voice." Men may be wooed back to God, but they are seldom driven, and why should we not deal gently with God's wayward children? Do you for one instant think those people who spiritually and morally have gone astray, are having a good time? Do you for one moment suppose that the man, who, like Laocoon, knows that he and his family are struggling amid the crushing coils of deadly serpents, on account of his sins, would not gladly be rescued from those enveloping coils, if we could only go to him gently in Christ's name, and offer to him the peace and the pardon, and the hope and the eternal life of the Gospel? Ah, yes, my brother, he would, he would. No man enjoys drinking the bitter dregs of remorse. No man, for mere pleasure, would allow Satan to keep on flaying him alive, as Satan is doing to his victims, all around us. Sometimes at first, looks are deceiving in reference to this. From the opened door of the saloon, or low haunt of vice, we hear the songs and the guffaws of laughter. Then we say, "Oh, what a high carnival is sin!" But stop. Is that all?

The worst taskmaster on earth is the devil. No man so much wants to crush the power of sinful temptation as that man who has been compelled to drink the bitter dregs of despair. Do not despise him; pity him, and with gentle words try to win him back to honor and to Christ. He deserves your commiseration. Therefore, if you and I are ready to go to God's outcasts; if we are ready to go to the sinners in Christ's name and say gently, "Brother, Jesus is ready to save you; Jesus wants me to be your friend and help you!" there would be no difficulty in most cases about the spiritual rescues.

Oh, how many sinners could be brought to Christ, if we would only practice the gospel of a gentle life! It is said that one of the hardest criminals of an Eastern penitentiary was converted by the gentleness of a little child. This little girl and her father were being shown through the prison wards. When the party came to a long flight of stairs the warden turned to this hardened life-prisoner and murderer near by and said: "Jack, carry her upstairs." When the hard-featured convict stooped down to pick up the little girl she looked up into his face with a smile and said: "Jack, will you kiss me?" And when he was about to put the little one down she said: "Now Jack, will you let me kiss you?" No sooner were those last words spoken than the old criminal's heart was melted. God struck the Rock of Horeb and it gushed forth with tears of penitence. Kindness did it. The gentleness of a little child accomplished what the blows of the keeper and the iron bars could never do. Oh, man, will you not start forth from this moment to win sinful men and women to Jesus Christ by the omnipotent power of a gospelized "Gentle Life"?

To save immortals for Christ, ought to be the chief mission of man. In view of which fact, again I ask the same question I asked before: Why should we not be gentle with the sins and wrongdoings of other people? Has not God been very gentle in his dealings with our sins? Therefore, if God deals gently with our sins, cannot we, shall not we, deal gently with the sins of others whom we want to bring to the Cross?

We have seen how man in his devotion to man was ready to sacrifice his all for an earthly master. Cannot we, at least in the same ratio, be willing to sacrifice our lives to the service of Jesus Christ, to bring sinners to Christ through the influences of a "Gentle Life." Should we not, shall we not, gladly go forth to bring sinners back to the altar of mercy by kindness and Christian love? Charles Wagner, the Alsatian preacher, in pleasure-loving Paris has rung the changes in the power of "The Simple Life." To-day I preach the Gospel of the "Gentle Life"—the tender gentleness by which God made David great, and by which we can, through Christ, make others great, and, through Christ, become great ourselves.

Speak gently; it is a little thing,
Dropped in the heart's deep well,
The good, the joy, which it may bring,
Eternity shall tell.

Mediation

RECENTLY there has been a renewal of the talk of mediation between Russia and Japan. Shocked by the ghastly slaughter, the humanitarians are now urging that the opportune moment has arrived for some friendly Power to suggest to the combatants the adjustment of their quarrel without further bloodshed. But the moment is not propitious. Both are strung to the highest pitch of patriotic intensity. One is flushed with successes; the other embittered by defeat. Neither side will listen to pacific counsel now; both are waiting expectantly for the decisive battle, which must come sooner or later, as it does in all campaigns.

Nearly two hundred thousand men have been killed or wounded since the beginning of the war; yet all this needless butchery might have been averted. There was a time when a word of pacific counsel from England, France or Germany might have closed the widening gap between Russia and Japan—a time when the Czar might have been persuaded to send the whole quarrel to The Hague for pacific arbitration. But the kings and cabinets were silent and let the golden moment pass by. And there was a time when the churches of Christendom might have exerted a united influence that would have gone far toward securing peace; but they, too, were silent. Yet not all silent; for there were bishops and prelates and high ecclesiastics who even approved of the war. Russia's hosts were sent forth to slay with the blessings of priests, and bishops, and metropolitans ringing in their ears. The cross of the Prince of Peace was waved before them, as an oriflamme to quicken their pulses and spur them to battle against the heathen. The Russo-Greek Church gave its sanction to the devastation of the Japanese, just as the English prelates did at the outbreak of the South African war.

Modern civilization rises in protest against a continuance of this struggle. Both combatants have sufficiently vindicated their claims to courage, the Japanese by their daring strategy and their reckless audacity, the Russians by their dogged determination, enabling them, like Antæus, to spring from the ground with renewed vigor after every reverse. On the hillsides and valleys of Manchuria have lain thousands of untended wounded and unburied dead. All the gentle offices of sympathy and kindness were forgotten in that struggle, when the tiger was let loose in men's hearts. Nowhere in the story of ancient or modern warfare can we recall more revolting horrors than those of the present war, with its ghastly trenches filled with quicklime to hide the bodies that lay like carrion; its funeral pyres greedily devouring those for whom even a poor grave in a strange land was denied; its neglected wounded the prey of human vampires; its ill-fed, half-naked armies fighting a hopeless battle, with cold, hunger, and deadly fever. Surely, in the year of our Lord, 1904, such things ought not to be. There should be another and a better way of settling men's quarrels than by the wholesale slaughter of their brother-men.

Our own government has already intimated its readiness, at the proper time, to offer its services in any capacity that may result in bringing about peace in the Far East. That time may arrive very soon. Let us trust, in the interest of humanity, that the appeal of the nation, as voiced by the Boston Peace Congress, may not be unheeded, and that no false considerations may persuade us to neglect the golden moment when the peace-maker may step in, without offense.

Humble Workers

LET us be thankful that, notwithstanding all its faults—its backslidings, its inhumanity, its commercialism and its low ideals—there are yet in this old world of ours many signs of true spiritual progress. It keeps on steadily pressing forward toward the light. Every passing generation witnesses a large increase in the hosts of the consecrated workers in the field, and the ranks of Christ's followers in public and private life are steadily swelling. Our great cities, as well as the rural communities, feel the throb and the impulse of the Gospel movement. Christian effort is noted everywhere, and the Christlike kindness that finds expression in deeds of benevolence and mercy is becoming world-wide.

Search around among your own acquaintances and satisfy yourself. Look beneath the surface; get at the heart of the man or the woman, and you will be surprised to find how many there are who love souls better than they love wealth; who place Christian character far above worldly honor; who do good in secret.

We love to think of those men and women in the humbler walks of life, who, in a worldly age, so live and act that their examples are a blessing and an inspiration to others. While more pretentious folks are striving for fortune or the world's applause, they are quietly going about their Father's business. In the shop or store, in the church society, in the home, they are sowing the good seed diligently, faithfully and with perseverance. All honor to these workers. The world is the better for them. Without them, and their simple teaching and spiritual influence, it would be a sorry world indeed.

The Workingman and the Church

ONE of the most hopeful signs of the times is the conference between labor leaders and the National Council of Congregationalists recently, at Des Moines, Iowa. Ministers of churches from every section of the country were present, and at their invitation the workingmen, especially those holding office in labor unions, came and explained their attitude toward the Church, and toward capital. Some of them were very frank in declaring their lack of confidence in the Church, but they were encouraged to proceed and to give their reasons for their opposition. This step has been delayed longer than is wise, but we are glad to see that one denomination has taken it, at last.

It was well that the ministers should learn that their apparent lack of sympathy with the struggles of the workingman has produced an impression that Christianity is for the rich. The mistake was a natural one, but it is so contrary to the fact, that the faults which have led to it cannot be too soon corrected. Christianity is for the rich and the poor, but not because they are rich or poor. It is for all men. The accident of their position does not include or exclude either class. The teachings of Jesus, as has been well said, does not recognize horizontal lines of separation. It is not an upper or a lower class that it sees. The line of separation that it does recognize is vertical, separating the good from the bad, and there are rich men and poor men on both sides of the line. It does not open the door of heaven to the poor man because of his poverty, nor close it against the rich because of his wealth. It looks to character only, and recognizes no other distinction. If the talk of the workingmen can bring ministers to see how the misconception of Christianity has arisen and enable them to remove it, the Church and the workingman will alike be benefited.

It will be an advantage, too, to both, if the Church no longer holds itself aloof from the struggle between labor and capital. The workingman is entitled to the sympathy of the Church in his efforts in two directions. As one leader explained, he was surprised that the Church did not actively participate in the struggle for restricting child-labor. In this the Church is directly concerned, as the welfare of the child was a part of its programme. It is concerned, too, in the shortening of the hours of labor. The time is not long past, as the ministers were reminded, when in some trades, fifteen hours was considered a normal day's work. When a man has worked for six days of such a length he is not in a condition to attend church on the seventh. Yet in the struggle which has reduced the length of the working-day, the men had been compelled to fight alone, and had not received from the Church, in its corporate capacity, the help to which they were entitled. They were conscious that the influence of the Church was helpful to them, and as one of the leaders said, "The labor movement thrives best where there is most Christianity; but there has been too little active help where the workingman might have been led to expect it. He has been alienated from the Church, because he felt that though he had righteousness and justice on his side, the Church, to which he naturally looked for help, held aloof.

In short, the reproach of the workingman is the burden against Meroz, that the children of God have not come up "to the help of the Lord against the mighty." The workingman has retaliated by fighting his battle alone and leaving the Church. It must be confessed that he has proved himself able to look after his own interests, but the Church has suffered for its inaction. Having gone to his help, his regard for it would have been increased, and perhaps there have been occasions when its influence in the trade councils might have moderated his demands and inured to his ultimate benefit.

Whatever the outcome may be, it is a good thing that both parties that this frank exchange of opinion has taken place. The Church has taken the right step, learning at first hand the causes of the alienation of labor. It has shown its sympathy with labor, and may hope that the Committees organized in the interest of the workingman will do much to broaden the sympathy and remove misconceptions on both sides.

"The Heart of the World"

UNDER the above title, a new serial by the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon will be begun in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at an early date (November, 1904). This story is one of singular intensity and earnestness, and will be read with great pleasure and profit. Not only is the action of the narrative such to claim attention, but the characters are drawn by a man who understands human nature, with its greed for gold and power. Vividly and naturally, he shows the force of the love of God in transforming the unregenerate. He shows most conclusively that no plan, however Utopian, can solve the complexities or reconcile the differences which assail those who live in this world unless it includes as its fundamental principle the love taught by Jesus, in his words and his life.

Pastor Sheldon draws his characters with a master hand. They move through the story, spurred on the way, and dominated by the most natural influence both from within and without, until a more potent influence than money, social position, or any other worldly lure comes into their lives. This illuminating influence makes possible a seeming miracle of character in more than one of the most unpromising characters that go to make up the cast in this drama of real life. There is no straining after effects, from the beginning where the hero renounces wealth, position, and the adulation of admiring crowds, to work according to conscience, until the end, when he sees and realizes the great good accomplished in following the leadings of his high ideal. The Reverend Frederick Stanton is a manly man, who has the happy faculty of arousing the quality in others, and he is never at a loss to give a clear, common-sense reason for the faith that is within him. There is a great and glorious principle enunciated in the book which the reader will quickly discover, and which none can fail to approve, so ably does Mr. Sheldon champion it. When his opponents cross swords with him on the absorbing sociological questions which are agitating all thinking minds of the day, his arguments are convincing and conclusive. The charming woman who marries him is in sympathy with his husband's efforts, helping and sustaining him during many a season of trial. There are no lay figures brought in for effect. Each character has a distinct purpose and serves it well. No one should fail to read the opening chapters of this story; they will need no urging to continue to follow the fortunes and struggles of these people, who are not the fanciful creation of a writer's brain, but living, vital personalities, who, in worldly aims and selfish desires, find no happiness until they are led through love to understand the "heart of the world."

The Bible and the Newspaper

Turkish Recruits

RECENT travelers in the Turkish Empire give a significant account of the class of men from whom the Sultan is drawing recruits for his army. They are said to be the fiercest, most desperate set of men in the country. A group of them is photographed in the illustration on this page. Their merciless character shows itself in their features. They are chiefly Albanians and form the most desperate and vallant of the Sultan's army. They come from Albania, a district lying on the coast of the Adriatic, south of Montenegro. It is nominally under Turkish government, but its people show little regard for any authority. They are really a law to themselves, and it often happens that one town or district is at war with another. The climate is fine and the soil fruitful, but little is grown in the northern districts but maize. In the valleys a little rice and rley is grown, but the mountain terraces are used as pasture for herds of cattle and sheep. In the Epirus regions there are olives, mulberry and fruit trees. Even cotton and indigo might be grown here, but the inhabitants are indifferent to the development of the country. The more stalwart of the men drift into the robber bands which infest the mountains of Macedonia and after a time enter the Turkish service. The population of the country is said to be about a million, but the number of Albanians, counting those in the Sultan's army, is much larger. They are absolutely without conscience and can be trusted to carry out the most cruel and brutal orders that are given them. In the isolation of Armenia, they bore a prominent part and were the most dreaded of the Turkish soldiers. The native Albanian is of middle stature; his face is oval, with high cheek bones; his neck is thick; his chest full and broad. His air is majestic and his costume picturesque. Unlike the regular industry, his whole delight is in war and plunder. The only semblance of order in the province, is that which the Sultan has adopted of drafting the robbers and most turbulent spirits into his army. They were originally nominally Christians, but the greater part have, from motives of self-interest, become Mohammedans. It is, however, no common thing for the family to be divided, the women and children going to the Russo-Greek Church, while the father goes to the Mosque. That such men should be employed by the Sultan to work his will on his inoffensive subjects is characteristic of his government, which responds to the picture drawn by the prophet:

For princes in the midst thereof are like wolves devouring the prey, to shed blood, and to destroy the just, to get dishonest gain (Ezek. 22: 27).

Using His Knowledge

A man who died recently in circumstances of extreme wealth in Chicago, had a strange experience. Some years ago he was working in a Colorado mine. There were mines all around it that were paying well, but this one had proved practically worthless. Though it was believed that there was precious metal there, it could not be found. One day the miner while at work struck it with his pick a lump of ore that he believed to be valuable. He put it in his pocket, and at the first opportunity took it to an assayer, who confirmed his impression of its being rich. He returned to his work and said nothing of his discovery. An accidental blast closed up the working and it was not re-opened. Soon afterwards the company abandoned the mine altogether. The miner, remembering his find, secured a twenty-year lease of it, and set to work to find the place where he had discovered his treasure. Eventually he found it, and having borrowed money, he recommenced digging. He was soon rewarded by finding a vein. He worked for several months, taking out a great quantity. He finally sold his claim for a large sum and then went

East to spend his fortune. Gambling and dissipation soon took it all. They took more than that, for the man's health broke down and he was near death. All his friends deserted him, and he died in a wretched lodging in extreme poverty. He proved the truth of the prophet's warning:

He that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool (Jer. 17: 11).

An Heir in a Dilemma

A difficult question is perplexing a young man in New York. He came here from Russia about eight years ago and settled down in the city. He did not attempt to obtain naturalization, but devoted himself to the learning of the language and the earning of a livelihood.

ALBANIAN RECRUITS FOR THE SULTAN'S BODYGUARD

His family in Russia was wealthy, and he had never been taught any trade. He was only fifteen years of age, so that his earnings were small. Gradually, however, he made his way, and is now earning a moderate salary as a machinist. Two years ago he married and is happy in his home. One day recently he met in the city a Russian from his native town, who told him that his father was dead and his brothers were trying to find him. He had left home on account of some boyish misconduct that had provoked his father, who was a severe disciplinarian, and had never communicated with his family since coming to this country. On hearing of his father's death, he at once wrote home and learned that he was entitled to a share in his father's estate. It was believed that the share would be $125,000. The only way he can obtain it is by going to Russia and proving his identity. He is afraid, however, that if he goes back he will be compelled to serve his term in the Russian army. As this may involve his being sent to the war, he naturally shrinks from the risk. Men will frequently hesitate to endanger their lives for money, though many do not hesitate to put their souls in jeopardy to gain it.

They that will be rich fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, which drown men in destruction (I. Tim. 6: 9).

A Child Sold for a Cent

A strange bargain came to light in a court in Jersey City, N. J., last week. Two neighbors had a dispute, and in the course of the evidence produced it was disclosed that one of them had bought a child from the other for a cent. It was contended by the mother, who could not read, that she had been deceived by her husband. She said she supposed that she was selling a household utensil to her neighbor. She wanted the child back again, but the purchaser clung to it, and produced a bill of sale, to which the mother, not being able to write, had affixed her mark. The curious document read as follows: "I, Thomas Bell, do resign all claims to my daughter, Rose Gwendolen Bell, on condition that said baby be taken care of, and in consideration of which I resign all claim to said Rose Gwendolen Bell in favor of John and Rose McDermott, for the sum of one cent, and if said baby should die inside of two months, I, Thomas Bell, will be responsible for her burial, and I resign all claims to said baby from the 7th day of September, 1904." It would appear from this document that the father took the chief part in the transaction. It shows how small a value he set upon the child that was committed to his care. How different in the value that Christ sets on a human soul.

Ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold... but with the precious blood of Christ (1 Peter 1: 18, 19).

Deafened by Noise

In a recent lecture on diseases of the ear, a medical expert quotes a fact, which he says is well known to every doctor in towns where men work among the clatter of machinery. It is that such men are unable to hear distinctly in ordinary circumstances, but can hear clearly in the noise of the mill, where other people can scarcely hear at all. The manager of a mill in Philadelphia told him that his men "are deaf at home, and wonderfully acute of hearing in the workroom. In a quiet place, where the ordinary tone of voice is distinct and sharply defined above all other sounds, they have to be almost yelled at by others conversing with them, and yet in the din of a mill they can carry on a conversation where the average person could not hear a shout. Yet, if the two were away from the mill, it would be the mill employee who would have trouble with the conversation, unless loud speech was resorted to. Away from the clatter of machinery to which his ears have been accustomed for years, the mill hand is more or less deaf, but in the midst of the rumble his sense of hearing is very keen." Unhappily the spiritual ear is affected in a similar way. A man who gives himself up to the acquisition of a fortune, is able to hear quickly enough in his business, but is often deaf to the "still small voice" that speaks to him.

A dreadful sound is in his ears; in prosperity the destroyer shall come upon him (Job 15: 21).

BRIEF NOTES

From a letter just received from Rev. E. Ryerson Young, we learn that the sermon published in our issue of Oct. 12 by him was his sermon, but the portrait which accompanied it was the portrait of his father, Rev. Egerton R. Young. We were misled by the similarity of names and regret the mistake.

Rev. Samuel H. Wilkinson, of the Mildmay, London, Mission to the Jews, is on an extensive tour in this country with a view of arousing an interest in the churches in behalf of his mission. He has already visited many of our large cities and is now in New York and will remain until Nov. 15. He will be glad to deliver lectures with illustrations by stereopticon of the life of the Jew in Palestine, Russia and London.

THE TWO CAPTAINS

BY CYRUS TOWNSEND BRADY

Author of "The Southerners," "A Doctor of Philosophy," "Hohenzollern," etc., etc.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

THE story begins in an ancient tower in Provence, where, early in 1793, the Marquis de Vaudémont, a French noble, his grandson Honoré, and his granddaughter Louise, aged seventeen, are besieged by a mob of their former tenants, reinforced by Jacobin soldiery, led by Jean Garron, an enemy of the marquis. Garron, through his violence and excesses in the "Reign of Terror," has been made a lieutenant in the French Navy, and is in command of the besiegers. In the defense of the tower, the three de Vaudémonts are assisted by Brébœuf, a retainer of the family, and by Aurore, a peasant woman, foster-sister of Louise. They are at the point of surrender, when an English ship-of-the-line, cruising along the coast, appears in sight, throws a few shot into the besiegers' camp, lands a party and rescues the besieged. The landing party is in charge of Lieutenant Macartney, an Irish officer in the English Navy. With the landing party is the captain of the ship, Sir Horatio Nelson. The young Comtesse Louise de Vaudémont admits them at the gate of the tower. Nelson transports all the de Vaudémont party to Toulon, which is in revolt against the Jacobins. Macartney falls in love with Louise, but his suit is met with cold disdain.

The siege of Toulon is described picturesquely. The arrival of a young French artillery officer, a military genius, is followed by the capture of Fort Musgrave, and the immediate abandonment of the harbor by the English fleet. Many fugitive Girondists and Royalists embark on the English ships. Amid scenes of terrible confusion the French Republican Army storms and pillages the town; the inhabitants being slaughtered with ruthless ferocity. Again the de Vaudémonts are rescued and received on board an English frigate, which is now commanded by Macartney, and are taken to Italy.

The scene now changes to 1798. Honoré de Vaudémont gets a command in the French Army, but plots to capture Napoleon. The old marquis and his granddaughter take ship for Brittany, to head a revolt in La Vendée. They are captured by a French fleet, and are put aboard Le Tonnant, under the command of the marquis' old enemy, Jean Garron. Among the papers of the marquis, is one which reveals the plot against Napoleon. Garron holds the marquis in confinement, and threatens to betray the plot to Napoleon, which will cause the death of Honoré and of the marquis, unless Louise consents to his suit. Macartney in his frigate is also captured by the French fleet, and, by a singular coincidence, finds himself a prisoner on Le Tonnant. He is surprised and delighted at again meeting Louise, and renews his suit with better hope. Brébœuf apparently turns traitor to the marquis, and becomes the trusted retainer of Garron. The latter makes a startling proposition to Macartney, offering to release him, and to betray the whereabouts of the fleet to the English, if Macartney will give up Louise. Macartney ostensibly accepts, and Louise is told by Garron of the British captain's faithlessness. By a clever ruse, Macartney compels Garron to let him take the marquis and Louise with him, in one of the ship's boats, while Garron is a prisoner in his cabin, disarmed and guarded by Brébœuf, who has now returned to de Vaudémont's service. Macartney lands his party at Alexandria, and the marquis meets Bonaparte, while the Irish captain sails off to seek Nelson and the British fleet. The marquis discloses Garron's plot to Napoleon, and the latter sets out with a party to rescue Brébœuf. They reach the fleet just in time to save the Breton. Garron, the traitor, is executed instead. Meanwhile, Macartney finds Nelson, and the latter proceeds to Aboukir Bay, to give battle to the French fleet.

BOOK SIX—Nelson

THE BAND OF BROTHERS

BRUEYS, singularly enough, in one of his conversations with Bonaparte, which has been preserved, had pointed out the disadvantage of receiving an attack at anchor. Yet when the time came to put his remarks in practice, he was in a painful state of uncertainty, whether to remain where he was or to get under way.

For one thing, he at first felt sure that the English would not engage. Then as the Alexander and Swiftsure were seen, increasing the number of his enemies to fourteen, he began to have an idea that perhaps they might attack him. He, therefore, decided to get under way and go out to meet them. According to his orders the topgallant yards were crossed.

Then Brueys abandoned this idea and decided to wait for them at anchor, or at any rate to allow the night to pass before anything was done. Certainly the English would not be mad enough to enter an unknown harbor and attack a superior fleet, say in the ratio of ten to seven, in a position of their own deliberate choice, in the dark?

It was not until after five o'clock in the evening, when the excited French saw the masterly maneuvering by which the English formed line out of apparently hopeless confusion, that Brueys became convinced that he had a fight upon his hands, which would begin just as soon as the English guns bore. How that attack would be delivered, and on what part of the line it would fall, he had absolutely no means of ascertaining.

There was something alarming in the swift, silent approach of the black English fleet. The sun was low in the horizon by the time the first ship had drawn within range. The western sky, slightly clouded, was a magnificent blaze of gold and color. The Goliath was coming on as swiftly and as silently as a shooting star. She was pointing straight for the head of the French line. What did she intend?

If Nelson would only lay his ships broadside to broadside of the French fleet all the way down the line, Brueys felt confident that he could at least stand him off in a drawn battle. An ordinary admiral would have done this. Brueys would have done it himself, and being an ordinary admiral, he had no way of fathoming the purpose of an extraordinary admiral like Nelson.

Neither he nor any one, save a certain old officer of the ancient French navy, quietly walking up and down the poop-deck of Le Tonnant, his granddaughter upon his arm, his faithful Brébœuf by his side, realized that what Brueys anticipated would certainly not be the thing that would happen. The admiral's view was that of a spectator. He had no duties to claim his attention, no interest in any particular ship. Dupetit Thouars, who had also been educated in the school of de Suffren, might have suspected something, had he not been so busily engaged in preparing his ship for action.

Expecting, as did their admiral, to be fought on the starboard side, the French captains, instead of casting overboard all necessary impedimenta, including the spare cabins which had been built upon everyone of the liners to accommodate the army officers, piled the dunnage up in great heaps on the larboard side, between the guns. Brueys' fleet was somewhat short-handed, but there were over a thousand sailors on the four frigates lying inboard of his line, who were in no danger from battle ships so long as they kept quiet and attended to their own business. The etiquette of war in that day kept battle ships from firing upon frigates, unless the frigates provoked an attack by joining in the battle. Brueys, as a final measure, directed that the bulk of their crews should be sent to re-enforce his ships-of-the-line.

CHAPTER XXXII

THE GRAPPLE OF THE LEVIATHANS

A FEW minutes after six o'clock, flags were broken out from the mastheads of the English ships. Nelson was only a Rear-Admiral of the Blue, but he had a peculiar affection for the white flag, and by his order, among the ensigns displayed upon the British ships, was the white ensign of a Rear-Admiral of the White. This flag, with its red cross of St. George, would be distinguishable in the darkness and could by no chance be mistaken for the French tricolor. He had also ordered all his vessels as soon as night fell, to string four lights horizontally from the mizzen peak. There was always danger that mistakes would be made, and Nelson felt that this would reduce danger to a minimum.

The Goliath, hard pushed by the Zealous, had barely maintained her place at the head of the line. Foley had clewed up his topgallant sails in preparation for battle, but the Zealous forereaching him, he had been compelled to set them again.

His ship made a magnificent picture as, with her sails gleaming white against the red glow of the dying sun, she swept down toward the head of the French line. Foley himself stood on the poop-deck to leeward, being the point from which best to observe the enemy, staring at the ships ahead of him. Although it was not yet dark, he could see the battle lanterns, which had been lighted in preparation for the coming battle, sparkling through the long lines of open ports with their black-throated guns, around which clustered the persistent and ancient enemies of England.

There was perfect silence throughout the ship, broken only by the uneasy groaning of the timbers, and the creaking of yards and cordage under the pull of the great topsails, as she swiftly slipped through the heaving waves rolling over the shallow ocean floor. The deep voices of the leadsmen in the main chains on both sides of the ship calling out the depth of the water in their rude but rhythmical chant, were the only sounds from human lips that could be heard, as the mighty Goliath rushed at the enemy.

Everything was ready. It only remained for the battle to be joined. The water was shoaling rapidly. The keel of the Goliath was perilously near the sandy bottom already. The time for a momentous decision had arrived. As Foley stared at the bows of the first French ship, the mighty Guerrier, something more than two hundred yards ahead of him, his keen eye detected a buoy floating far forward of her bows. The French ship was riding to a long scope and that buoy marked the position of her anchor. There was no order as to just what he should do with his ship, but Nelson's words in one of the conversations they had had on the Vanguard during the cruise flashed into his mind. "Where there is room for a French ship to swing, there is room for an English ship to pass," and to anchor, too!"

He would do it! Instead of rounding to on the outside of the French line, he would cut across the bows of the anchored ship and bring up on the other side. Amazing and portentous resolution! He risked his ship for the gain that would come.

Foley had been with Rodney at the Battle of the Saints when the old man broke through the French lines. He learned then that it was a bad habit of the French to pile their dunnage on the disengaged side. He could do more damage and receive less hurt than to windward. Other ships might follow his example; others still might drop along the entire side of the French line. He saw the coming battle in his mind as if it were a picture. That great line of French ships would be caught between two fires and crushed to destruction.

"I intend to throw my fleet upon the French vessels and center," Nelson had said.

Whether it would be better to station two British ships, one off the bow and the other off the quarter of each French ship, both on the same side, or whether it would be better to double on the French line, was a question. Foley decided quickly, and decided correctly, that doubling was the proper move.

It was twenty minutes after six now. A burst of flame and smoke from Le Guerrier, another from the next astern Le Conquérant, and the battle was joined.

"Call the men from the chains!" said the English captain quickly. They were of no use to him; he had decided. "Man the larboard battery! Hands by the tops! and t'gallant sheets and halliards! Lead aloft the clew-lines! Steady!"

There was a little confusion, soon settled, as the men shifted to the larboard batteries and as the stokers took their appointed stations. The French broadsides, badly aimed, had done little or no damage to the English ships. Into the smoke the Goliath drove with headlong speed. Almost abreast of her and a little to windward, came the Zealous. Foley glanced aft, and there, keeping magnificent order, swarmed the war monsters of England. He had only time for a single look.

The guns of Le Guerrier were speaking again. She began to come aboard. Men fell here and there. The crash of splintered timbers was heard above the roar of the discharge. The men looked at their captain. Did he intend to run down Le Guerrier, now close aboard? But no. He leaned over and spoke to the man at the helm. Slowly the spokes of the wheel revolved. The great ship swung up to the wind slightly. Another moment and her bowsprit drew across the head booms of Le Guerrier. The battery on Bonaparte Island was sputtering fire. It was too far away to do much damage. No one paid any attention to it.

Hood in the Zealous, close behind the Goliath, saw Foley's astonishing manœuvre. Was the Goliath going to pass athwart the hawse of the French fleet? Expecting every moment to take ground, yet holding on with the same indomitable determination that marked Foley, Hood came following after with his noble ship. Now the Goliath was fairly abreast of Le Guerrier. Every gun on the English ship bore upon the French vessel. Hollowing his hand, Foley shouted a fierce command. Instantly the whole side of the Goliath burst into flame. At pistol shot distance every gun double or triple shot, swept Le Guerrier with a besom of destruction.

"Settle away sheets and halliards!" roared Foley. "Clew up and clew down! Hard up with the helm! Load and fire! Give it to them, men!"

At once the sails upon the yard-arms disappeared as if by magic. In the excitement they were clewed up the yards, which were hauled down to the caps in less time than it takes to tell it.

"Let go the starboard anchor!" shouted Foley.

By Nelson's orders, every ship had fastened a cable around the mizzenmast, carried it through a stern port and thence outside the ship forward, where it went to one of the bower anchors. Nelson directed his ships to anchor by the stern. This precaution would prevent them from swinging under fire as they would have done coming down the wind if they had anchored by the bows, thus giving the French a chance to rake them. Anchored by the stern they could go ahead simply by veering cables, and as the wind would be aft it would give them immediate control of the ships in case it became necessary to make sail.

Something was wrong with the anchor, however, and it did not drop until the Goliath had swept past the antagonist which she had elected to fight, and had dropped down to the larboard quarter of Le Conquérant, and the larboard bow of La Spartiate. Right on the heels of the Goliath came the Zealous. With nice seamanship, Hood dropped his anchor where Foley and intended to stop, just off the larboard bow of Le Guerrier. Hard after the Zealous came the Orion. Taking a wider sweep, Saumarez threw his ship across the bows of Le Guerrier, raking her for the third time as he passed. Then he crossed the stern of the Zealous, and ran swiftly down outside of the Goliath now fiercely engaged, her guns in one continuous roar from her rapidity with which she was fought. Inboard of the French line lay the first of the frigates Le Sérieuse, a forty-gun ship. As the Orion came sweeping along, the frigate foolishly opened fire on her. To her first broadside, Saumarez paid no attention although Barker, his first lieutenant, begged him for permission to return it. "No," said the captain, "perhaps she will come again." Sure enough Le Sérieuse veered cable, and again opened fire on the Orion. With a sudden sweep of the helm, Saumarez swung his great ship in toward the frigate. She had invited her own doom. At close range, within the length of a cable, one mighty broadside was hurled upon her. She was dismayed, her masts dismounted, and in five minutes she sank, fortunately for her crew drifting on the sands as she did. The Orion then anchored abreast of the fifth French ship, Le Peuple Souverain. After the Orion came the Audacious. Gould did not round the French van ship. He boldly thrust his vessel in between Le Guerrier and Le Conquérant, firing Le Guerrier with his starboard battery and Le Conquérant with his larboard guns as he did so. He came to anchor off the bow of Le Conquérant, and there he clung, raking her with every shot. Into the smoke of the battle the Theseus now moved. Cool, calm, collected as any captain who had fought, instead of being outside of the British ships engaged on the other side of the French line, Miller, observing the French were firing high, boldly sailed the Theseus between the Zealous and Le Guerrier, so close to the latter that their yards almost touched; past the Audacious and Le Conquérant, between the Goliath and Le Spartiate, firing shot and shell in each of the French in succession, while receiving little damage himself; and at last dropped anchor by the side of L'Aquilon, just abaft the Orion. Hard on the wake of the Theseus surged the mighty Vanguard. The excitement of the past two months had completely departed from the little admiral. Ice is the only word to describe his coolness. Yet the accentuated glow of his face, and the very blaze of his eyes, seemed to exhibit the magnificent exultance of the admiral, as he watched the marvelous handling of his ships by their captains. A strong, northerly wind carried the smoke of the battle far down the lines, and every manœuvre was as plain, and as easily to be understood as if he had been watching a game of chess. Never in the history of naval warfare was there so magnificent a spectacle, as was presented that summer evening in the Bay of Biscay.

Nelson, accompanied on one side by Berry, on the other by Macartney, slowly paced the deck of the Vanguard. As on every ship, her men were at quarters. He was ready for action, and her crew thirsted for the moment when the attack was to be made. "Look at Foley! See how he takes his ship to action, as if the eyes of England were upon him!" exclaimed Nelson, unconsciously quoting Jervis, as he leaned far over the weather rail and stared past the other ships of the van, to see what the leading liner was about. "He will be into the French ship," said Berry quickly, "if he doesn't change his course!" "His word, like that of Troubridge at St. Vincent. 'Let the weakest fend off,' I fancy," said the great admiral, smiling with stern pleasure at the recollection. "What's he about, I wonder?" queried Macartney, turning the others and staring at the bulk of the great ship outlined blackly against the setting sun. "We shall see in a second," answered Nelson. "If he guesses rightly, he will cross the bows of—"

"He springs his luff!" cried Berry suddenly. "He turns up!"

"You're right! She's going inside!" answered Macartney. "She'll take ground, she'll take ground!"

"No," said Nelson, "what did I tell you? Where there is room for a French ship to swing, there is room for an English ship to pass! Magnificent! There goes her broadside. Well done, Goliath!"

An instant after, a terrific crash was heard above the irregular rattle of the French fire, as the English van ship let fly her larboard battery in the face of Le Guerrier. The overwhelming sound told those seamen who clustered around the black guns on the lowest deck in the very vitals of the flagship that the first blow had been struck for England. A spontaneous cheer burst forth from the men on the Vanguard.

"There goes the Zealous!" cried Nelson. "Right in her track. Raked again. Heavens! Yon French ship must be a slaughter pen! Where's Foley?"

"He's brought to, abreast the third ship, sir," cried Macartney pointing.

"Now it's the Orion, superbly handled like the rest!"

"Look at the Audacious, Sir Horatio! She's breaking through the line!"

"Ay, ay," said Nelson, "and there go both her broadsides at once! It's magnificent! Were there ever such captains as mine, Macartney? Berry, 'twill be our turn soon. Take another look through the batteries. Let no man fire until the order is given!"

"Admiral," said Macartney, who had happened to look to seaward, seizing Nelson by the arm as he spoke, "look yonder! The Culloden!"

"Macartney!" cried Nelson, "she's ashore! Poor Troubridge! He would give his soul to be here! Who's that with him?"

"Instantly the whole side of the 'Goliath' burst into flame"

"The Leander. And La Mutine, I think."

"I pray God he can get off. For his sake, mark ye, Sir Robert, for his sake, not mine! The loss of the Culloden gives us the odds that I like. The greater the honor."

"The Theseus is passing between our ships and the French, sir."

"There's no better seaman nor fighter in the fleet than that daring American. What would Troubridge give to be here! Look yonder, Macartney! Did anything ever come on more gallantly than the Minotaur and the rest?"

"Splendid, splendid!" cried Macartney. "It's a pity the Swiftsure and Alexander are so far away."

"There will be plenty of chance for them to get into the fight before it is over," said Nelson. "This is but the beginning. Yet I'll wager that burly Ben Hallowell is fretting his life out. Poor Troubridge's mishap will serve one purpose. They will be sure to give the shoal a wide berth. Think you she can get off in time?"

"I believe not. See! The Leander has left her."

"I ought to order that boat out of the line, but—ah, well, it would break Thompson's heart. Poor Troubridge, poor Troubridge! I had rather lost my other arm than—"

"Sir Horatio," said Berry, "in two minutes more we shall be in action. What shall we do?"

"Bring to on the outside of the French line. The third ship yonder will be your mark. We'll double them; and look ye, Berry, no firing until you have clewed up!"

Le Spartiate the third ship of the line was already engaged with the Goliath and the Theseus, but as Nelson's flagship came swinging along in the growing twilight she let drive a broadside at her from her starboard guns. Berry paid no attention to that and, born fighter that he was, he kept the Vanguard going ahead until she was almost aboard of her. He dropped anchor and brought to the ship in less than thirty yards distance from her doomed opponent. Not a shot was fired until the yards had been settled away and the cable clewed up. Then the starboard broadside was poured into the devoted French ship.

Just ahead of Le Spartiate lay L'Aquilon, one of the best ships in the French fleet. She seems to have been the only one except Le Tonnant which had carried out the admiral's order and put a spring on her cable; for, as the Vanguard came to anchor, L'Aquilon, not yet completely engaged, since Miller in the Theseus was dividing his fire between that ship and Le Spartiate, sprung her stern to starboard and began to rake the Vanguard. For a moment Nelson's ship was in somewhat the position of the van of the French line, for he was being assailed by two ships of equal force to his own, one of which was partially raking him with every discharge.

"This is hot work, Sir Horatio," said Macartney, above the roar of the battle.

"It is. But to think what it must be on those French ships yonder."

"They are raking us with every broadside, admiral," said Berry; "we can't stand this much longer."

"Thank God, here comes the Minotaur!" cried Nelson, as the great black hulk of the largest ship in his fleet drew swiftly past the unengaged side of the Vanguard, gallant Louis, standing on the rail waving his hat at Nelson. With beautiful seamanship, so soon as he cleared the Vanguard, Louis swung the Minotaur in ahead of her, forcing L'Aquilon back into the line and hotly engaging her. By this means he relieved Nelson.

It was six forty-five, just sunset, when the Minotaur opened on L'Aquilon. There was a gap between the Minotaur and the three remaining ships, the Defence, leading with the Bellerophon next and the Majestic last, but all three close together. It was seven o'clock, therefore, before the Defence dropped anchor on the starboard side of Le Peuple Souverain, furiously engaged on the other side with the Orion.

A moment after, Darby, missing Le Franklin in his haste to get into action, shoved the Bellerophon, looking very small indeed against her antagonist's towering sides, close aboard L'Orient.

With a roar like that of a thunder-clap, the huge three-decker opened on the gallant 74. Le Franklin, next ahead of L'Orient, divided her broadsides between the Defence, the Orion, and the Bellerophon. Last of all the ships engaged in the first part of the action, came the Majestic. A good place for Westcott to have put his ship would have been between the Defence and the Bellerophon, opposite Le Franklin, but in the darkness, for the short twilight had faded, and in the confusion caused by the smoke, he missed that station and brought to squarely abreast the eighth French ship, Le Tonnant.

Dupetit Thouars had been waiting with what patience he could for his particular opponent, and the Majestic was scarcely within range, when he hurled a broadside into her. The two leviathans of war were soon engaged in a terrific grapple.

The position of Le Tonnant was much better than that of any of the other French ships engaged, as she had only one enemy upon which to concentrate her fire.

The French ships were suffering dreadfully. Le Conquérant literally had been the first ship to surrender. Five minutes after she struck, Le Peuple Souverain, smashed into helpless wreck, parted her cable and drifted out of her place in the line. She did not bring to until opposite L'Orient. The Orion immediately veered cable and followed her, dividing her fire between the beaten ship and Le Franklin. Saumarez' example was followed by Peyton with the Defence.

40,000 Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts

Here are 1,900 pages of purest honey gathered by Charles Noel Douglas, from the Roses, Clover Blossoms, Violets, Morning Glories, and Geraniums of the Literature of all ages.

This great work, Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, just published, has placed the whole realm of literature under generous tribute in order that its 1,900 pages of wit, wisdom and sentiment might be invested with the grace, the loveliness, the sparkle, and the strength of the literature of every age, nation, language, clime and sect.

Fourteen Hundred Different Topics, as wide in scope as human thought can conceive, embracing every subject that stirs the human heart, or engages the human mind, are illumined from every point of view for the information and delectation of reader, thinker, writer and speaker.

Forty Thousand Quotations, whose Purity, Brilliance and Surpassing Worth have already been Attested by Master Minds, are garnered up in this Casket of Gems, to be used for the Enrichment and Adornment of Lecture, Sermon, Conversation, Correspondence, and Address.

No Library can justly lay claim to Completeness without a set of Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts, and no other work published can serve as a substitute, or compare with it in genuine and general utility.

The Two Magnificent Volumes, illustrated on this page, and containing over 1,900 pages, illuminated title, artistically bound in superior cloth, we offer to send, all charges prepaid, together with The Christian Herald for one year, for only $3. Extra Sets, $2.00.

RUSSIA'S NEW COMMANDER

GEN. GRIPPENBERG, who has been appointed by the Czar to command the second Manchurian army, is a veteran officer of great military experience. He is regarded in Russia as nowise inferior to Gen. Kouroupatkin as a strategist. His command will consist of nearly 500,000 troops, with cavalry and artillery, practically equal in strength to the first Manchurian army now in active service. It is hardly probable that Gen. Grippenbergs and his troops can take the field before next spring. Meanwhile, the campaign in Manchuria progresses with amazing activity. The battle begun on Oct. 10 along the Shaho river, south of Moukden, was kept up intermittently for nearly two weeks. Fighting at the river and at Yentai was of the most desperate character. Positions were lost and retaken by both sides in rapid succession, and at frightful sacrifice of life.

In the first ten days of this unusual conflict, it is believed that the killed and wounded on both sides reached a total of nearly 80,000, Russia being the heaviest sufferer. The hardest fighting took place at Bensihu, where the Russians lost heavily in men and guns; at Endotiuila, where hundreds of Japanese were bayoneted in their trenches; at Tumin Pass, where the Japanese artillery played havoc with several Russian regiments; at Temple Hill, where Gen. Kouroupatkin had a narrow escape from death by a shell; at Shapao, where the Japanese right drove back the enemy and occupied the town; at the banks of the Tatzeho River, where Prince Kanin, of Japan, led a desperate cavalry charge against the Russians, driving them back for miles, and capturing large quantities of arms and ammunition; at Lone Tree Hill, where 14,000 Japanese who had captured the position were routed by the Russians in a determined night attack, the latter capturing eleven guns, and at the village of Chenlianpu, where the Russians captured by enfilading the Japanese.

No detailed reports of losses have been received. One correspondent telegraphing to St. Petersburg says 23,000 wounded passed through Moukden in one day. Gen. Ku's men found 1,500 Russian dead on the field in front of them in four days.

Marshal Oyama reported that 2,000 Russian dead were left in front of his Centre Army, and 4,500 in front of Kuroki's line on the right. This makes a total of 8,000 dead, and furnishes a basis for an estimate that the total Russian losses in the great battle will be at least 40,000.

As far as can be gleaned from the many conflicting and fragmentary accounts, the Japanese seem to have succeeded in advancing their whole front about ten miles since the battle began, but at great sacrifice of life. The Russians were fighting to keep their northern line of communication intact, and also to relieve the Japanese pressure on their left, which threatened at one time to envelope a considerable part of their army. Attacks and counter attacks were made almost daily. One Japanese regiment under Col. Yamada was literally cut to pieces. The character of the fighting may be judged by the statement of a Russian General of division, who was wounded in the foot, and whose troops were a part of a force told off to hold the rocky heights on the east front of the Russian line during a furious battle. He said:

GEN. GRIPPENBERG

The Commander of Russia's Second Manchurian Army

"The attack of the Japanese was of an unheard-of character. Their losses were terrible, as the troops had to climb almost vertical slopes in the face of a hail of bullets. The Twenty-third Siberian Regiment lifted into the air several Japanese on the point of their bayonets. The Turkish war was nothing to this one."

Correspondents describing the carnage in the long ten-day battle, record the results of the hand-to-hand fighting. Whenever the Japanese stormed a position, the Russians, after delivering volley after volley, would rush out of their trenches, meeting the assailants with bayonets, knives and clubbed rifles in endeavors to stop the advance. Hundreds were hacked to pieces with bayonets and knives, while others had their skulls crushed with rifle butts.

The surgeons on both sides found it impossible to cope with the unceasing stream of wounded. The best organized hospitals were wholly inadequate for such furious fighting. Thousands of wounded lay on the field for hours without attention, crawled in pitiful agony, seeking help and shelter. Thunderstorms increased the agonies of the wounded, many of whom cried to passers-by to be put out of their misery or to be taken out of the rain. Rivulets from the hillsides caused by the downpour were crimsoned with blood. Some of the heaviest Russian losses were among the Jewish, Finnish and Polish regiments. Bodies lay sometimes six deep after the hand-to-hand struggles.

Both armies have lately received large reinforcements. On Oct. 21, there was a truce along the whole battle-front, some thirty miles in extent. It was expected, however, that active operations would soon be resumed.

In the long-drawn engagement both sides claimed a victory. It was simply indecisive. Kouroupatkin failed in his attack, but held his line. The Japanese line is also intact. The really decisive battle is yet to come.

A Prayer Chain in Japan

By a Florence Crittenton Missionary

THE Florence Crittenton Rescue Home at Okubo, Japan, was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies on May 14th. We had four hundred guests, three hundred and fifty of these being Japanese, showing the sympathy that is felt toward this worthy charity. The foreign missionary ladies furnished cake and sandwiches. Our matron stayed up all night previous, with the older girls, to make Japanese lunch (sushi) which is put up in little boxes. She sold two hundred of these lunches. We did not get all our knitted shawls disposed of, but during the day we netted 132 yen, forty-five sen. This we divided equally between the Japanese and our foreign treasurer. All were pleased with the building, and a picture was given to each guest. It was dedicated free of debt. We have enough to complete the payments, and we thank God for the way he has opened hearts to give. The transfer of the property from the three private trustees to the Association known as the Zaidan cost us something over 150 yen. This we must meet, as the Japanese women during war times cannot do more than sustain the Home for six months. I am trying to make their burden as light as possible by making needed bedding, and planting a garden, so that they may get their vegetables from it, instead of buying as heretofore.

We have sent out two girls, one to service in a school kitchen, where one of our House Committee is the principal of the school. Another we sent to prepare herself to take a nurse's training. One of our trained nurses (a Rescue Home girl), was married this week to the only son of the principal of the Nurses' Association—a church wedding. We have taken two others in within the last six weeks, and they are doing nicely. Before Kimi went away to school, I racked my brain to think of something to make a lasting impression on her, and bind her to the Home. So at evening prayers, her last Sabbath, I suggested that we form a "prayer chain." Any one who prayed would be a link in the chain, and always on Sunday night we would pray for each other by name, and the one who was away, would be still a link, and before God the chain would always be complete, so long as each one prayed. I said, "you may ask God for any thing you want," and suggested things that would be proper, and things that would not be proper, and said, "now, unless you pray from your heart, God will not hear you, and you will not be a link in the chain at all." As I had said nothing about this to the matron beforehand, I felt just a little nervous lest she might think it is a little too progressive, but when I said: "will you be the first link? and then anyone who wants to, may follow," she took us right up, and one after another followed, just as they sat in a circle. Next to me a little girl about nine, who cannot yet read, raised her hand and said:

"Sensei (teacher), may I pray?"

"Certainly, child, if you want to."

And her simple trembling lips said: "Oh, God, make me good; help me to be obedient and keep Kimi good. Amen."

Before we got around the room, there was sobbing and confession of sin and consecration of lives. The one who sat nearest the matron was her elder sister, and until we took her in to act as assistant matron last October, she was a stiff Buddhist, and had never heard the Gospel; but morning and evening she heard it, and often I would ask her to help the little ones with their catechism or Bible reading-lesson. That night she, for the first time, prayed, making fourteen links in our prayer chain. The matron again poured out her heart in a prayer of thanksgiving, so I feel that the chain is fastened to the very throne. Our dear Kimi cannot forget her farewell meeting.

We hope the interest aroused during our building this Rescue Home may be continued, as, if we fill the Home, it will mean more to feed them, and during the war our Japanese sisters have so many other interests.

Okubo, Japan.

I. K. McCauley.

Child Redemption in Africa

CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will remember an article published not long ago, telling of South Africa's Gospel sunrise, and how much the missionaries had done and were doing to bring the blacks of that part of the "Dark Continent" to a knowledge of the Christian religion. The importance of redeeming the children, was ably set forth by the Rev. E. H. Richards, who has labored long and faithfully among the dusky natives of that region. The invitation given to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to lend a helping hand in the work of "child redemption" has been generously responded to, as will be seen by the following extracts from letters received:

"In memory of a beloved son. To-day is his birthday, and I am trying to use the money ($15) that would have been his, in a way that I am sure would meet with his approval." Very sincerely, Mrs. F. M. Coles.

Rev. J. F. Gracy, pastor Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Lakeland, Fla., writes: "This is a preacher's tithe money; with it goes his prayer that it may be so used as to glorify God" ($15 enclosed).

Mr. and Mrs. Allen Yoder send $15, with the assurance that the same will be forwarded each year, "as long as required." The Light Street German M. E. Sunday School Missionary Society of Baltimore, Md., sends $5, the last of four remittances of $5 each from this society. Miss Louise Hamm of Brooklyn, N. Y., sends $10, saying: "I give it with a thankful heart to God, that he may give me the pleasure to learn the way to the fear of the Lord, and to work for his name." "I. H. N." sends $5, and writes: "I expect, if God spares my life, and provides the means, to send a like amount three times a year as long as necessary." Mrs. F. A. Russell sends $5, with a promise of the remaining $10 before Jan. 1905. Ada L. Ayers and friends send $7.50, promising to send the remaining $7.50 at the end of six months. Mrs. C. E. Skinner forwards her first installment of $5.00 "for the education of a little negro boy." Mrs. Skinner says: "I count it a precious privilege to be, in some measure, the means of bringing one heathen boy to the knowledge of Jesus Christ."

In further response to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD appeal in behalf of the dusky little boys and girls, Miss Mary E. Green sends $15.00. Leon F. Pennipacker, a member of the "Raven's Club," of East Greenville, Pa., sends $10.00. A postal order for $30.00 is sent by Lucretia C. Ramsburg, who wishes to provide for one African boy and one girl.

"I wish the people would eagerly embrace such excellent opportunities to care for little heathen children. I much approve of getting the children into Christian missions, and training them to be our Heavenly Father's servants."

All contributions to this fund for African child redemption will be acknowledged in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Intercessor

This is written with the prayer that if you are a backslider, you may be led to return to God

FATHER! I bring this worthless child to thee,
To claim thy pardon once, yet once again.
Receive him at my hands—for he is mine,
He is a worthless child but owns his guilt;
Look not on him, he cannot bear thy glance;
Look thou on me, his vileness I will hide;
He pleads not for himself—he dares not plead;
His cause is mine; I am his Advocate.
By that unchanged, unchanging love of mine,
By each pure drop of blood I lost for him,
By all the sorrows graven on my soul,
By every wound I bear—I claim it due.
Father, divine, I can not have him lost!
He is a worthless soul, but he is mine.
Sin hath destroyed him; sin hath died in me.

Death hath pursued him; I have conquered death;
Satan hath bound him; Satan is my slave.
My Father, hear him not; not him, but me;
I would not have him lost for all the world,
Thou for my glory hast ordained and made,
Because he is a poor and contrite child,
And all—his very hope on me reclines.
I know my children, and I know him mine.
By all the tears he weeps upon my bosom;

By his full heart that beateth against mine;
I know him by his sighing and his prayers,
By his deep trusting love which clings to me.
I could not bear to see him cast away.
Weak as he is, the weakest of my flock—
The one that grieves me most, that loves me least.

Yea, though his sins should dim each spark of love,

I measure not my love by his returns. [Home,
And though the stripes I send to speed him
Drive him upon the instant from my breast,
Still he is mine. I drew him from the world;
He has no right, no home, but in my love;
Though earth and hell against his soul conspire,
I shield him, save him, keep him—we are one.
O sinner! what an Advocate hast thou!
Methinks I see him lead the culprit in,
Poor, sorrowing, shamed, all tremulous with fear;

Prostrate behind his Lord, weak, self-condemned,
Clad with his Saviour's spotless righteousness.
Himself to hide, and hear the Father's words;
My son! his cause is thine, and thine is mine,
Take up the poor lost one—he is forgiven.

Exiles for Christ's Sake

AMONG the numerous sects which fled to America on account of the religious persecutions in Europe, centuries ago, none have a more interesting history than have the Schwenkfelders. They alone, among the many sects, are the only ones that hold the day of the landing of their ancestors sacred. This day is to them as sacred as to the Americans is the day when the Mayflower sailed into Plymouth.

The Schwenkfelders are one of the smallest religious sects in this country. They number about seven hundred souls. They are direct followers of Casper Schwenkfeld, who was born of catholic parents, at Ossig, in Silesia, Germany, in 1490, and died at Ulm, on December 10, 1562. He was educated at Liegnitz, Frankfurt, Cologne and other European universities, and later entered upon the life of linen is spread over the benches, the frugal meal of fresh bread, good butter, made by the Schwenkfelder farmers, and freshly cooked apple-butter, is spread, and all the visitors are hospitably invited.

Immediately after landing, they settled in the Perkiomen region, known as one of the most fertile farming regions in Pennsylvania. They erected their first church at Hosensack, Lehigh County, in 1790. All prior services were held at the homes of the members. The Hosensack church, the first public place of worship, was built of logs. This building was replaced in 1838, and remodelled in 1893.

They have only seven churches in America, and one mission. The other churches are the Washington Church at Clayton, Berks County, erected 1791, rebuilt in 1824 and remodelled in 1883. In 1793, a church was erected at Towamen.

PASTOR O. S. KRIEBEL. SCHWENKFELDER CHURCH AT CLAYTON, PA.

a courtier for a number of years, after which he became a student of the Bible. He aided in the spread of the Reformation and helped to spread the new light in Silesia, for which he received the thanks of Luther.

Persecution followed persecution, and Schwenkfeld's followers suffered from this cause for more than two centuries, being thrust aside by the religious leaders, for certain differences concerning non-essentials in doctrine. Schwenkfeld, however, won many friends to his cause. There was a promising prospect that Silesia would embrace the Reformation by "the Middle Way," as the movement under Schwenkfeld was called. However, the opposing forces were powerful, and Schwenkfeld, to save his friends, left home voluntarily—giving his 1,000 acre tract of land unto his brother, with all his cattle.

His followers fled to Upper Lusatia, Saxony, and later they were compelled to leave Saxony. They decided to go to America, and their actual migration began on April 20, 1734. After arriving in Amsterdam in June, they came to Plymouth on July 17, and on the 29th of that month they were on the blue Atlantic bound for America. On September 22, 1734, they landed at Philadelphia, in the ship St. Andrew, the "Mayflower of the Schwenkfelders." One of the Pilgrims and nine of their children died during the sixty-day voyage. The day after their landing, they declared their allegiance to King George II., and the following day, September 24, they devoted to rendering thanks to the Lord.

After their first Thanksgiving service, a meal, consisting of bread, butter and apple-butter, was served. Annually, since that time, the Schwenkfelders have met on September 24, to celebrate their Memorial Day, known among the Pennsylvania Germans as "Gedaechtnisz Tag." The exercises consist of addresses, prayers, singing of hymns, delivery of sermons, and historical addresses bearing on Schwenkfelder history. They hold two sessions, forenoon and afternoon, and between those exercises, the clean table cin, Montgomery County, where the memorial services were to be held this year. Another was erected at Kraussdale, Lehigh County, in 1825. In 1836, the Worcester Schwenkfelder church at Worcester, Montgomery County, was erected, and another was built at Lower Salford in 1860. The last of their churches was erected in Philadelphia, and dedicated on October 23, 1898; while a mission was established at Norristown, Montgomery County, last spring.

The Schwenkfelders are strong advocates of education, and believe in Christian training for their children. They maintain one of the best preparatory schools in the State, at the head of which is one of their own ministers, Rev. O. S. Kriebel, who preaches for the congregations worshipping in the three churches, known as the Upper District. Four hundred students are enrolled, some of them from foreign countries.

During the last few years the Schwenkfelders have been active in missionary work, and have supported native workers and students in China and India, as well as Armenia. On August 30, Miss Flora K. Heebner left San Francisco for China, the first missionary the Swenkfelders ever sent to the foreign field.

The Schwenkfelders, it is claimed, had Sunday Schools in Europe more than 200 years before Robert Raikes, in 1781, opened his school at Gloucester, England. As early as 1543 they printed a manual for Sunday School instruction.

Most of the Schwenkfelders are farmers, and they own as fine farms as can be found anywhere, consisting of from 100 to 200 acres of the very best land. They are hard workers, enjoy good health, and have all the latest improved farming machinery to work with. They live simple Christian lives, and seldom marry outside of their own people. Kindness is one of their characteristics, as Schwenkfeld's cardinal point was, "Love thy neighbor as thyself," and his motto was, "If I have Christ, I am not sad."

"The Wandering Jew" Legend

IT is well known, says a writer in The Hebrew Standard of New York, that the legend of the Wandering Jew was circulated in England during the thirteenth century. An Armenian bishop is said to have brought it to that country. Gradually it spread all over Europe. Of course, shrewd men knew how to speculate upon the credulity, not only of the ignorant, but also of the so-called cultivated classes, and therefore Ahasuerus was seen now in one country and then in another, until the end of the eighteenth century. About the year 1267, he turned up in Forli, and in the fourteenth century in Siena. The doctor of theology, Paulus von Elgen, Bishop of Schleswig, while delivering a sermon in Hamburg, "saw him among the worshippers, garbed as a student and his eyes filled with tears."

In the year 1600, Ahasuerus appeared in the Netherlands. According to a chronicle (MS.) to be found in the library of Ghent (we cite the Cologne Gazette), particulars are given of another Wandering Jew. On May 25, 1623, there appeared before one of the gates of Ghent, a stranger, peculiarly dressed, bald, and wearing a long, gray beard. He supported himself on a pilgrim's staff. The citizen on guard, Daniel de Breyne, asked the old man in Flemish who he was, and received an answer in Spanish, "I am the Wandering Jew." The astonished burgher led the stranger to a higher official, who subjected him to a lengthy examination. The stranger stated that while Christ, on the way from Golgotha, sought rest in his house, he had driven him away, whereupon Jesus condemned him to wander continually until the Judgment Day, and to subsist upon the gifts of the charitable. The stranger then entered an inn, where, thanks to the alms lavishly extended him, he lived well and luxuriously. In Ypern and its vicinity he had only to show himself, when rich and poor contended with each other for the privilege of alleviating his lot. Ahasuerus was invited to dinner by the Bishop, who gave him a grand reception. Then he became the guest of many notabilities, a high Spanish officer among others. There the Wandering Jew met his fate. A servant of the officer asserted that he had served with the strange guest in the same Spanish regiment, and they often slept in the same bed. This charge was corroborated by the colonel of the regiment.

Besides, other misfortunes befel Ahasuerus. A woman appeared in Ypern whom, three months before he had married in Saint-Omer. He was compelled to admit that not only was he the legal husband of the woman, but that instead of coming from Palestine, he was a Frenchman named Leopold de Vort, and a deserter from the Spanish army.

His confession provoked universal indignation, and the "double" of the Wandering Jew was sent in irons to Ghent, where the colonel of his former regiment turned him over to the hangman with short shrift.

Our India Scholarships

MANY of our readers will be interested in the following letter, which relates to a work in India that they have generously aided for some time past:

"MEDICAL SCHOOL, LUDHIANA, PUNJAB. 'Dear Christian Herald':—May I tell you a little about the students for whom your readers are giving scholarships and some for whom we still need scholarships?"

"Mary Morton (chosen for Miss Walburn), is in her second year and is doing very well. She is a bright, superior girl, and takes an active interest in the Y. W. C. A., besides playing the organ in church."

"Salome Prem Masih, a younger sister of a former native Christian student who worked very faithfully. We trust Salome may do as well."

"Rosie Singh has been here nine months, and is training as a nurse. She also is quite satisfactory."

"Eva Ullah entered for the medical course this spring. She is putting her heart into her work. Recommended for a scholarship."

"Rajarbai, from Ahmednagar, needs a scholarship. She is a very superior girl, with an earnest Christian character. She has passed the matricular examination, and will be a very valuable worker."

"Naomi, a nice sensible girl, sent from the Hills from the A. G. M. Mission. She joined during the winter session."

"I can thoroughly recommend two nurses for scholarships, viz: Miriam, a native girl, and Alice, a Eurasian."

"Your sympathy and help are a great encouragement to us. EDITH M. BROWN."

Shall We Lower the Bars?

"If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." I. John 2: 15.

SHALL we lower the bars, and let them in? The whirling dance, with its oft-timed sin; Could we ask our Lord to join us there? Do you think he in the dance would share?

The card, with its fascinating charm, Luring its victims on to harm; Leading so oft to the gambling den— That trap of death to unwary men?

And the play-house, with its brazen glare— Should we find our "Father's business" there? Would our Master join the giddy throng, With its vulgar jest, and its ribald song?

Would it speed the coming of our King, Into the Church the world to bring? For the Church he suffered, bled, and died; And he by the world was crucified.

The Church is his temple, so he said— Should she drop the bars the world to wed? "Unequally yoked" they would surely be, For the Church and the world can not agree.

Nay, nay! We must never yield our stand, Nor give to the world a welcome hand. "Dead unto sin," "in newness of life," We must shun the paths where sin is rife.

'Tis Satan's device to bring them in, To lure the weak into ways of sin; And with glowing tints he paints his lair— Beware, O Christian! Beware! Beware!

The "road" for the Church of Christ is strait, But ever leadeth to heaven's gate; And pleasures the sweetest there abound; No joys like these in the world are found.

Shall we lower the bars?

JENNIE WILSON HOWELL.

Pastor Sanford and the Children

THE Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, the well-known pastor of Hackensack, N. J., who recently visited our Children's Home at Mont-Lair, and gave the waifs a most delightful and instructive afternoon, writes concerning the work there as follows:

It is with great interest that I read in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the accounts of the work at Mont-Lair, the 'Children's Paradise' for it reminds me of a very pleasant recently, when I had the pleasure not only of giving the children a stereopticon on the Holy Land, but of catching a glimpse of the lives consecrated to noble of being understood by a child, in harmony with God's independence of character, and the only one that satisfies. Nevertheless, it may still be true that drops of water never divided rays of light into the seven prismatic colors until after the Flood.

To Sunday School Workers

Sunday, November 27th, having been set apart as the World's Sunday School Temperance Sunday, the National Temperance Society has prepared a Temperance Concert Exercise with music and recitations suitable for the occasion. Sunday Schools can secure all they can use free, on condition that they pay expressage and take a collection for the missionary work of the Society. This is a splendid opportunity to do good work in the Sunday School and help a worthy cause. Write for supplies of Concert Exercises and Pledges to National Temperance Society, 3 East Fourteenth Street, New York City.

Among the Workers

—REV. T. C. HARPER and evangelistic singer J. Owen Long have recently closed a very successful meeting at Ottobine, Va.

—THE ANNUAL CONVENTION of the American Anti-Saloon League is to be held in Columbus, O., November 16 to 18. Delegates are being appointed by the church bodies throughout the entire country, and the indications are that this will be the greatest gathering ever assembled under the auspices of the movement.

—REV. FREDERICK WEISS, the well-known American missionary in Morocco, arrived in the United States from Tangier last week. He brings with him a young Moorish boy of sixteen, who will be trained here to become a worker among his own people. Mr. Weiss is prepared to speak to audiences concerning Morocco. His present address is Shenandoah, Ia.

—EVANGELIST JACOB FLUCKIGER, some account of whose work as a traveling missionary appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD several years ago, has lately finished a somewhat remarkable Gospel tour. He labored successfully in Switzerland among the poor of Wischenschgraben and Schonegg, Canton of Berne. Thence he went to Australia, visiting and speaking at Adelaide and Sydney; thence to the Fiji Islands, to Honolulu, and back to Los Angeles, Calif. He has no income, and his work is one of faith exclusively.

—MR. LEMUEL LUCAS JOSHI, graduate of the University of Bombay, India, is in this country taking a course in medicine, to fit him for medical mission work in his own land. He is a young man of exceptionally fine qualifications and courage, and has been able to keep abreast of the other students, as well as to carry off the one prize offered his class, that was given by Dr. Austin Flint. He is a most entertaining lecturer. Churches, Sunday Schools, Young People's Societies and Literary Clubs can secure Mr. Joshi's services for meetings within reach of New York, by writing to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Answered Prayers

S. C. R., Roanoke, Va. "I wish to acknowledge God's loving kindness in answering special prayer many times."

A Reader, "The Lord answered many prayers for me, and I believe he will answer many more if I come to him in faith."

A Subscriber, Greenville, N. Y. "I desire to acknowledge and gladly testify that our loving Father hears and answers our prayers."

L. B., Norway, Me. "I was greatly burdened for the welfare of a dear child. I told God about it and he has wonderfully answered my prayer."

Adell C., Brighton, Colo. "God has answered prayers for me, but it does strengthen my faith so much to know so many are receiving answers to their prayers."

A Sister in Christ, Sparta, Mich. "My prayer has been answered, and many blessings added, which I did not ask for. Praise his holy name for what he has done for me."

Reader, New London County. "God has answered my prayers in regard to spiritual and temporal blessings. I find that his will is very generous, and covers all our needs of spirit, soul and body. God hears and will answer prayer. I. John 5: 14, 15."

A Reader, Waverly, N. J. "I have received much comfort reading the 'Answered Prayer' column. I have had many answers to my prayers, one recently. I feel so grateful. I must acknowledge it. I am still praying for a cloud to be lifted. Will all readers of this please ask God to help me."

M. M., Hartford, Conn. "I have read in your paper the answer to so many prayers, I would like to add mine. I prayed for one very dear to me, and the prayer was answered beyond what we even prayed for. Perhaps this will help others to try the power of prayer."

Longing Heart. "I have seen wonderful things come to pass in answer to prayer. I knew an old man past eighty, a drunkard and an infidel, converted in answer to the prayers of two faithful daughters. I have an urgent case for which I am trying to claim the promise of God."

E. C., Culver, Kan. "I wish to acknowledge a direct answer to prayer. It was at a time when human aid had reached its extremity that I prayed to God for help, and he heard me, and answered my prayer, and I shall ever praise him for it. Man's extremity is God's opportunity."

You Can Play Them Without Learning

The Church Choir Zobo Band of Paterson, N. J.

This band was organized by the church choir and organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for church and missionary purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in an Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient and is now taking outside engagements. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

Read What Pastors and Organists Say About Our Instruments

Rev. C. McKinnin, of East Grand Fork, Minn., says: "I am pleased with the instruments, and have organized a band with big success." Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we need, as we have a very small organ. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, a wonderful success." Rev. W. H. Simpson, of St. John, West New Brunswick, Canada, says: "I am sending you express money today, as those I have are very satisfactory and suited for giving church entertainments." Also refer you to Rev. Jas. J. Seider, of Menomonee, Wis.; Rev. Robt. R. Clelland, of Pablo Beach, Fla.; Rev. W. H. Mahaffie, Ph.D., Burlington, Iowa. Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from pastors who have had our goods, but we believe that we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

Can Be Played By Anyone Who Can Hum a Tune—No Learning

Wedge away with the long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced, so constructed that the human voice comes out so wonderfully, as to make it melodious beyond all imagination. It seems impossible for it to accomplish so much. It gives you the vocal power of giants, yet its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove, or the thrilling song of the nightingale. It is a money and music making feature for Church Choirs and all other concertists. It improves the voice. Sing into the mouth piece—Zobo does the rest.

With a Full Band a Grand Pipe Organ Effect Can Be Obtained

Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost. Every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band.

Helping Others Her Life-Work

MRS. SILAS F. WRIGHT

Baptist Mission at LeRoy Hall, 2163 Eighth Avenue, with which Mrs. Silas F. Wright has been prominently connected since it began. This young and remarkably successful worker has a record of active service that is quite unusual. It was she who secured

SO marked the success of the spiritual work at the Gospel Tent Peniel, One Hundred and Tenth Street and Eighth Avenue, New York City, that it has been decided to continue the meetings as long as the weather will permit. This work was the outgrowth of the

She had entire charge of seven weekly meetings and eight Lord's Day meetings, and held many meetings at the homes of inquirers after Gospel instruction. She finds her way to the hearts of old and young with rare tact and kindness, and by many original and unique methods. Mrs. Wright has also held eighty-four meetings for children. Through her efforts, sixty-nine children were sent to the country for an outing. She has also been identified with other forms of humanitarian and benevolent work; providing medical treatment and care for the sick, and clothing and financial help for needy ones; she has aided in the rescue of the victims of drink; has sent many invalids to the seashore; has helped the unemployed to secure employment, and has been instrumental in placing many little child waifs in juvenile homes, where their lives will be made brighter and a career of usefulness opened to them.

One of the ingenious methods adopted by this energetic worker was the organization of an Outing Society for Cripples. This society, twice a week during the summer months, did much good in taking large numbers of helpless invalid children on short rides through Central Park and Riverside Drive.

A GOSPEL MEETING IN TENT PENIEL

the plot on which Tent Peniel was erected; also the lumber and material for flooring, 300 chairs, the platform carpet, piano, a full supply of Bibles for the Bible School, and many other articles indispensable to the conduct of the work. During the past summer, she made 488 home calls, attended 236 meetings, taught a class of boys each Sunday and served as the school's assistant superintendent.

Many of the little beneficiaries were taken from the hospitals in carryalls.

In prison work and in various other fields of Christian effort, this indefatigable worker has also rendered good service, and there has come to her the precious assurance—which comes to all who are unselfishly striving to uplift the fallen and to win souls to Christ—that her labor has not been without its reward.

Peace in Central America

AT the recent Peace Congress of the Central American States, held in Corinto, a proclamation was issued by the Presidents of Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Guatemala, in which the following outspoken declaration was made:

"After a conference in which the present political problems of Central America were discussed, and taking into account all of the factors which contribute favorably and adversely to the development of our nations, we have agreed to make the following declaration to the people of Central America:

"The maintenance of peace is the primal object of our governments, not only because it is a necessity for the people, whom we represent, but also because it is a duty which must be fulfilled by the Spanish-American nations.

"We are, therefore, firmly determined to overcome all obstacles that might disturb this peace, and we will unite our efforts to frustrate the intentions of those who try to spread among us distrust and unfounded jealousy, guided by a spirit of ambition, hatred and a love of disorder.

"A strict fulfilment of the international treaties that bind us shall be the rule that shall guide us in our actions, so that all efforts to break our unity shall be vain and futile, as all must needs acknowledge that the generality of the agitations of the enemies of each administration are not aimed at a laudable purpose, but are inspired by egotistical interests, by personal enmities, by the aberration of some frenzied mind."

Insurrectionary movements are not to be started in one country for the purpose of invading another. To check these movements, the governments will hereafter keep a close watch out on their respective frontiers and allow no organized bands to cross them.

The "Prison-Gate" Mission

Editor The Christian Herald:

THE character of the Prison-Gate work is such as to powerfully commend itself to the humane and the Christian. It is (1) To save from prison arrested men guilty of minor offenses, provided they evince repentance, and a determination to lead moral lives, who are worthy of the Chaplain's intervention.

2. To find employment for such, and to keep them under the watchful supervision of those appointed for the work.

3. To care for men just discharged from prison, to find them employment, and keep them under Christian influences.

4. To afford temporary help to those who are earnestly seeking employment, and trying to lead moral lives.

The number of fallen men assisted by the Prison-Gate Association during the past year was 485.

This noble work is deserving of the warm and generous support of all who desire the reformation of the criminal, and the well-being of society.

The Prison Gate has the cordial approval and commendation of the leading judges of New York and Queens Counties, and many very encouraging testimonials have been sent to the good chaplain.

As one who has received a helping hand from Mr. Munro, I take great pleasure in offering this tribute of praise and my unspeakable gratitude. And if an appeal from an old transgressor will induce the good people of New York City and vicinity to generously contribute to so glorious a cause, I make it with the greatest of pleasure, and with the earnest prayer, that many wayward men may be led to "depart from evil and cleave unto the good," under the beneficent influence of the Prison Gate.

"WHACKS"

And What They Mean

When Old Mother Nature gives you a "whack," remember "there's a reason," so try and say "thank you," then set about finding out what you have done to demand the rebuke, and try and get back into line, for that's the happy place after all.

Curious how many highly organized people fail to appreciate and heed the first little "whacks" of the good old Dame, but right along with the habit whatever it may be that causes her disapproval, Whiskey, Tobacco, Coffee, Tea, or other unnatural treatment of the body, until serious illness or some chronic disease.

Some people seem to get on very well with these things for awhile, and Mother Nature apparently cares but little what they do.

Perhaps she has no particular plans for them, and thinks it little use to waste time in their training.

There are people, however, who seem to be elected by Nature to "do things." The old Mother expects them to carry out some department of her great work. A portion of these selected ones oft and again seek to squander and then deaden the tool (the body) by some one or more of the drugs—Whiskey, Tobacco, Coffee, Tea, Morphine, etc.

One knows all of these throw down the she class of alkaloids in Chemical analysis. They stimulate and then depress. They take from man or woman the power to do his or her best work.

After these people have drugged for a time, they get a hint, or mild "whack" to remind them that they have work to do, a mission to perform, and should be about the business, but are loafing along the wayside and become unfitted for the fame and fortune that waits for them if they but stick to the course and keep the body clear of obstructions, so it can carry out the behests of the mind.

Weakness is a call to "come up higher." These hints come in various forms. It may be stomach trouble or bowels, heart, eyes, knees or general nervous prostration. You must depend upon it when a "whack" comes as a warning to quit some abuse and do the right and fair thing with the body.

Perhaps it is coffee drinking that offends. It is one of the greatest causes of human disorder among Americans.

Now then if Mother Nature is gentle with you and only gives light, little "whacks" at first to attract attention, don't abuse her consideration, or she will soon hit you harder, so.

And you may also be sure she will hit you very hard if you insist on following the way you have been going.

It seems hard work to give up a habit, and carry all sorts of plans to charge our ill feelings to some other cause than the real one.

Coffee drinkers, when ill, will attribute the trouble to bad food, malaria, overwork and so on, but they keep on being sick and gradually getting worse until they are finally forced to quit entirely, even the "only one a day." Then they begin to get better, but unless they have gone long enough to set up some fixed organic disease, they generally get entirely well.

It is easy to quit coffee at once and for all, by having well-made Postum, with its rich, pale, seal brown color, which comes to the beautiful golden brown when good cream is added, and the crisp snap of good, mild Java is there if the Postum has been boiled long enough to bring it out.

It pays to be well and happy, for good old Mother Nature then sends us her blessings of many and various kinds and helps us to gain fortune.

Tip off the handicaps, leave out the dead-end habits, heed Mother Nature's hints, quibbling a loser and become a winner. She will help you sure if you cut out the things that keep you back.

There's a reason" and a profound one. Look in each package for a copy of the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

The Woman Errant, by the author of the People of the Whirlpool. A wholesome tale of the present day, with the scene laid in southern New England, New York City, and a provincial town of New York State. How Barbara, the commuter's wife, kept her "wonder book," and the story woven from its pages can be read with profit by any girl or woman, who, knowing no spur of necessity, goes out into the world to become a "woman errant."

The characters in the story are all amiable, normal people, with the exception of Ivory Steele (why such an inane name?) who starts out to have a career, and to live her own life. Like "Tommy Toddyhigh" in the nursery rhyme, she tried to "show what she could do," with the result, complete mental and physical breakdown, from which, happily, she recovered, cured, let us hope. The author is evidently both a student and lover of nature, and her descriptions of out-door life in the country are in refreshing contrast to Ivory's artificiality and self-delusion. Price $1.50. Macmillan & Co., New York, publishers.

The Tragedy of Paotingfu, by Isaac C. Ketter. This is an authentic story of the lives, services and sacrifices of the Presbyterian, Congregational and China Inland Missionaries, who suffered martyrdom at Paotingfu, China, on June 30 and July 1, 1900. The story is one of remarkable devotion and self-sacrifice. Much of interest is contained in the letters written by Mrs. May Gilson Simcox, wife of Mr. Frank Edson Simcox. Mr. and Mrs. Simcox embarked for China almost immediately after their marriage in 1893. From this time until the dark day of their martyrdom, the story is one of consecrated work among the Chinese. Three children came to cheer and brighten their lives—two boys and "Baby Margaret"—who perished in the flames with their parents and other devoted souls, when the mission house was burned at Paotingfu. Published by Fleming H. Revel Co., New York. Price $2.

Sabrina Warham, by Laurence Houseman. An interesting tale of a woman's life, tangled through the duplicity and weakness of a man who married her. She loves him, but learning of his heartless treatment of a poor, weak, loving girl before the marriage, her love turns, and she refuses to live with her husband longer. A cranky old bedridden uncle and an invalid mother serve in part to bring out the excellencies of Sabrina's character. After many trials she reaches quiet waters. Price $1.50. Published by Macmillan Co., New York.

Mr. Osoba's Last Discovery, by Geo. W. Bell. Col. Bell was for seven years U. S. Consul at Sydney, Australia. The author gives his ideas as to the government of New Zealand, and incidentally puts the Maoris in a pleasant light. Col. Bell could have done this quite as successfully without taking up a quarter of the space, and have made his points quite as convincing if he had approached them directly, instead of wandering all over the earth's surface and a good share of its interior before the reader is introduced to this "Treasure Land" at the antipodes. The story, however, will interest many readers. Published by The New Zealand Times Co., Wellington, New Zealand.

"Old Folks' Day" in Vineland

The Presbyterian Church in Vineland, N. J., was crowded to the doors on the morning of September 11th. The occasion was the fifteenth annual observance of "Old Folks' Day." From far and near, the old folks came, until ninety were present, sixteen of them being over eighty years of age. Rev. Dr. King, the pastor, preached from Isaiah 46: 4: "And even to your old age I am He; and even to hoar hairs will I carry you." Dr. King's theme was God's promise to carry the aged in his bosom, as a parent carries a child. Rev. O. O. Campbell sang a solo, which he learned when he was a little child. He then sang "Beulah Land," the audience joining in the chorus. Bouquets were given after the service to all who were over eighty years of age. Mr. James Samuels, the oldest man present, was born in 1812. Mrs. Hannah Shaw was in her ninetieth year. This was a remarkable gathering, and the old folks entered into the spirit of the occasion with great zest and joy.

APPLE BUTTER

One of "The 57"

is a refined "Apple Sauce" or "Conserve of Apples" not as well known in some families as it deserves to be. It is made of selected tart apples boiled down in sweet cider with granulated sugar and delicately seasoned with pure spices of our own grinding. There's always a treat in store for those who haven't tried it.

HOW TO USE IT

For tarts, puddings or as dessert, either plain or with cream, it is unequalled and with plain bread! just let the children try it once for luncheon, and they will tell you all that we haven't room to say about it here. You may try it and if for any reason you do not like it, your grocer will refund full purchase price.

May we send you a beautiful booklet about our bright, sunny kitchens and the "57" good things prepared in them by our neat uniformed workers? A postal brings it. : : : : :

HOT HOLD NOVELTY WORKS, Chicago, Ill., or Buffalo, N.Y.

Let this Machine do your Washing Free.

There are Motor Springs beneath the tub. These springs do nearly all the hard work, when once you start them going. And this washing machine works as easy as a bicycle wheel does. There are slats on the inside bottom of the tub. These slats act as paddles, to swing the water in the same direction you revolve the tub. You throw the soiled clothes into the tub first. Then you throw enough water over the clothes to float them. Next you put the heavy wooden cover on top of the clothes to anchor them, and to press them down. This cover has slats on its lower side to grip the clothes and hold them from turning around when the tub turns. Now, we are all ready for quick and easy washing. You grasp the upright handle on the side of the tub and, with it, you revolve the tub one-third way round, till it strikes a motor-spring. This motor-spring throws the tub back till it strikes the other motor-spring, which in turn throws it back on the first motor-spring. The machine must have a little help from you, at every swing, but the motor-springs, and the ball-bearings, do practically all the hard work. You can sit in a rocking-chair and do all that the washer requires of you. A child can run it easily full of clothes.

When you revolve the tub the clothes don't move. But the water moves like a mill race through the clothes.

The paddles on the tub bottom drive the soapy water THROUGH and through the clothes at every swing of the tub. Back and forth, in and out of every fold, and through every mesh in the cloth, the hot soapy water runs like a torrent. This is how it carries away all the dirt from the clothes, in from six to ten minutes by the clock.

It drives the dirt out through the meshes of the fabrics WITHOUT ANY RUBBING,—without any WEAR and TEAR from the washboard.

It will wash the finest lace fabric without breaking a thread, or a button, and it will wash a heavy, dirty carpet with equal ease and rapidity. Fifteen to twenty garments, or five large bed-sheets, can be washed at one time with this "1900" Washer.

A child can do this in six to twelve minutes better than any able washer-woman could do the same clothes in TWICE the time, with three times the wear and tear from the washboard.

This is what we SAY, now how do we PROVE it? We send you our "1900" Washer free of charge, on a full month's trial, and we even pay the freight out of our own pockets.

No cash deposit is asked, no notes, no contract, no security.

You may use the washer four weeks at our expense. If you find it won't wash as many clothes in FOUR hours as you can wash by hand in EIGHT hours, you send it back to the railway station,—that's all.

But if, from a month's actual use, you are convinced it saves HALF the time in washing, does the work better, and does it twice as easily as it could be done by hand, you keep the machine.

Then you mail us 50 cents a week till it is paid for.

Remember that 50 cents is part of what the machine saves you every week on your own, or on a washer-woman's labor. We intend that the "1900" Washer shall pay for itself and thus cost you nothing.

You don't risk a cent from first to last, and you don't buy it until you have had a full month's trial.

Could we afford to pay freight on thousands of these machines every month, if we did not positively KNOW they would do all we claim for them? Can you afford to be without a machine that will do your washing in HALF THE TIME, with half the wear and tear of the washboard, when you can have that machine for a month's free trial, and let it PAY FOR ITSELF? This offer may be withdrawn at any time it overcrows our factory.

Write us TO-DAY, while the offer is still open, and while you think of it. The postage stamp is all you risk. Write me personally on this offer, viz: R. F. Bieber, General Manager of "1900" Washer Company, 292 Henry St., Binghamton, New York.

Different Now

Fels-Naptha soap cuts wash-day in half. No steam, no hot water, little rubbing, half the wear on clothes.

FELLOWSHIP

UNION in thought, in affection, in controlling principle, naturally draws men together. Christ intended that it should be so in his Church. He drew his first disciples from their several occupations, with the simple words, "Follow me." From that time, each, in following him, became the associate of the others. A closer bond than that of natural brotherhood was established between them. As he became the inspiration of their lives they felt that sympathy with one another that made them more than mere companions. When he was withdrawn, they fell back on one another for consolation and encouragement. To whom could they go but to men with the same hopes and aims. So, it has been in the Church, so it ought always to be. "Ye are brethren." There is beneath all our superficial divisions an essential unity between men, in whom religion and love of Christ occupy the place they are intended to occupy.

This solidarity ought to exclude envy and jealousy. The supreme object of every Christian ought to be the welfare of the whole church. If one member succeeds, the church gains; if one fails, the church suffers. Each contributes as God gives the power, and no one should envy another's prominence. There should be in every one that spirit of love, which is the best of all the graces. It is the one essential grace which makes men godlike. There is no better evidence of a conversion being genuine than that love springs up in the heart for every one who loves Christ. That man, by his affection, becomes my brother. He is bound to me by a fellowship that reaches to the heart. He draws the inspiration of his life from the same source, he is striving after the same likeness, he has the same hope and the same spirit.

Ye are the body of Christ. In a New York hospital, a young man was lying near death. He wanted to see a clergyman, and the pastor of a neighboring Baptist church was hurriedly summoned. The preacher spoke to him of Christ's love, and urged him to trust in him. Then he knelt by the bedside and prayed. The Episcopal matron, two Roman Catholic sisters of mercy, and two patients who were Methodists, listened, and, as the clergyman rose from his knees, there was a hearty Amen from all.

Love never faileth. A well known author describes the power of love, under the figure of a flame. A piece of iron needed to be separated. The axe said: "I can do it," but its head was broken by the iron. Then the saw said: "I can do it," but its teeth were worn down by the hard surface. "Shall I try," said the flame, and it curled gently around the iron until it melted.

Seeketh not her own. A man lost his wife and afterwards a son whom he tenderly loved. No will was found after his death. His effects were sold at auction. One of his servants bid for the child's portrait, and though she was poor, she was so eager to possess it that she bid beyond her means, borrowing a little to make up the amount. When the picture was taken down, a will was found attached to the back, in which the man had left the whole of his property to the person who loved his boy well enough to buy his portrait.

Love never faileth. A woman so violent that no warden dare go into her cell, and whose meals were thrust in through a hole in the door, was visited by a Christian lady. The latter had been warned that she might be killed, but she was not afraid. Entering the cell, she said, "I want to be kind to you, because Jesus loves you," and she went to the poor, passionate, degraded being and kissed her. "Go away, go away," said the prisoner; "you will break my heart. No one has kissed me like that in twenty years. You make me think of my mother." The poor creature broke down, and, for the first time since her imprisonment, wept like a child. Her visitor stayed with her, telling her of Jesus' love for her, until she looked up in wonder. Step by step, she was led to trust in Him, and all her fury and passion left her.

RHEUMATISM

Relieved Through the Feet

Thousands Are Being Relieved Home Every Month by The New Discovery, Which Is Sent to Everybody to

TRY FREE—PAY WHEN SATISFIED

The son of S. J. Pearce, health officer of New Westminster, B. C., had rheumatism so badly that he couldn't walk alone. Magic Foot Drafts relieved him in a week.

Mrs. Mary Patrick, Watertown, N. Y. for more than a year couldn't get up from her chair. Magic Foot Drafts relieved her.

The Drafts relieved Z. H. Palmer of Hamburg, Pa., who had suffered twenty years.

H. C. Van Valkenburg, Providence, R. I. writes: "I don't believe any person ever had muscular rheumatism as bad as I have had and recovered so quickly, for which I thank your Magic Foot Drafts."

Letters from the above and many thousands of other relieved patients are on file in our offices where anyone can see them.

We want the name and address of every sufferer from rheumatism. Write us to-day. Return mail will bring you—free to the pair of the famous Magic Foot Drafts—the great Michigan discovery which is relieving all kinds of rheumatism, chronic or acute. If you are satisfied with the benefit received from the Drafts, send us one dollar. If not, keep your money. You decide.

The Drafts are worn on the feet because the largest pores are there; but they relieve rheumatism in every part of the body to stay relieved—because they absorb the impurities from the blood through the pores, and reach the entire nervous system through the extremely sensitive nerve centers of the feet. Don't suffer needlessly, but send your name to-day to the Magic Foot Draft Co., R A 5 Majestic Bldg., Jackson, Mich. The Drafts, together with our splendid free book on rheumatism, will come by registered mail. Send no money—only your name. Write to-day.

GIFTS FOR THE TEMPLE

By MRS. M. BAXTER

ANY piety which is dependent on another child of God, be he cler-gyman or layman, is unable to stand when put to the test. God will accept nothing secondhand. Every man must himself believe for his own salvation; every man must personally give an account of himself to God. It was not until after he had been married to two wives, and had children growing around him, that Joash "was minded to restore the house of the Lord" (II. Chron.
24: 4). No doubt, through the instruction of Jehoiada he had formed his purpose. How was the money to be obtained for this work? In the first place, he gathered together the priests and Levites, and commanded them to go into all the cities of Judah and gather of all Israel money to repair the house of the Lord; and he said, "See that ye hasten the matter." But this was no easy thing to do. Zeal for the house of the Lord had declined. The grandmother of Joash, the wicked Athaliah, had permitted and encouraged her sons to break up the house of the Lord, and they had gone so far in their sin that "all the dedicated things of the house of Jehovah did they bestow upon the heathen." It was most unlikely that in response to an order from the king, sudden zeal for the house of the Lord should awake among the populace of Judah. The work was done without "heart," and "the Levites," perhaps from self-interest, "hastened it not." All which went to the house of the Lord meant so much less for them.

But the king, thanks to Jehoiada, was not ignorant of Scripture. He knew the provision which God himself had ordained for the maintenance of the tabernacle, and therefore appealed to the prophets:
"All the money of the dedicated things that is brought into the house of the Lord, even the money of everyone that passeth the account [or the money of the persons for whom each man is rated, R.V.], and all the money that cometh into the man's heart to bring into the house of the Lord, let the priests take it to them, every man of his acquaintance; and let them repair the breaches of that house, whosoever any breach shall be found"
(II. Kings 12: 4, 5). But so little heart was put into the work that Joash had actually reigned twenty-three years, and the work was not done (ver. 6). Then the king called Jehoiada.

This means much. Why was Joash so unsuccessful, and why, when Jehoiada was called into the work, did it succeed?
Joash might have learned the reason.
Was not God with Jehoiada? The king said to Jehoiada, "Why hast thou not required of the Levites to bring in out of Judah and out of Jerusalem, the tax that Moses, the servant of the Lord and of the congregation of Israel, for the total of the testimony?" Now a change took place—the authority of God had been asserted.
So the king commanded, and they made a chest, and set it without, at the gate of the house of the Lord, and they made proclamation throughout Judah and Jerusalem; and, instead of unwillingness and lethargy, "all the princes and all the people rejoiced, and brought in and cast into the chest until they had made an end"
(II. Chron. 24: 6, 8-10, R. V.).

God had said to Moses in the wilderness, "When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel, according to those that are numbered of them, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul out to the Lord, when thou numberest them."
This shall they give every one that passeth over unto them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary."

This was the tax to which Joash referred, and which Jehoiada's influence was used of the Lord to obtain from Israel without compulsion. It was the tax which was paid by our Lord for him and Peter, with the piece of money out of the fish's mouth (Matt. 17: 24-27). It would seem from II. Kings 7: 7, 8, that the priests had been in the habit of taking money, perhaps the atonement money, from their acquaintances and appropriating it to their own use, and so neglecting to keep up the house of God.

I Can Sell Your Real Estate

No Matter Where It Is

IF I did not have the ability and facilities to sell your property, I certainly could not afford to pay for this advertisement. This "ad." (like all my other ads.) is practically sure to place on my list a number of new properties, and I am just as sure to sell these properties and make enough money in commissions to pay for the cost of the "ad." and make a good profit besides. That is why I have the largest real estate business in the world to-day. Why not put your property among the number that will be "listed" and sold as a result of this "ad.?"

A Specialist in Quick Sales

I will not only be able to sell it—sometime—but will be able to sell it quickly. I am a specialist in quick sales. I have the most complete and up-to-date equipment in the world. I have branch offices throughout the country, and a field force of upwards of 3,000 men finding buyers. I do not handle any of the side lines usually carried by the ordinary real estate agent. I do not make any money through renting, conveyancing, insurance, etc. I must sell real estate—and lots of it, or go out of business. I can assure you I am not going out of business. On the contrary,
I have already sold twice as many properties this year as I did during 1903, and I expect to sell several times as many next year.

Let Me Sell Your Property

It doesn't matter whether you have a farm, a home without any land, or a business; it doesn't matter what it is worth or where it is located. If you will send me a brief description of your property, including your lowest cash price, I will tell you how and why I can quickly convert it into cash, and will give you my complete plan (FREE) and terms for handling it. The information I will give you will be of great value to you even if you should decide not to sell. You had better write now, before you forget it.

If You Want to Buy

If you want to buy any kind of a farm, home or business in any part of the country, tell me your requirements. I will guarantee to fill them promptly and save you some money at the same time.

SHEDDON METHOD OF TREATING SPINAL CURVATURE

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble, you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of spinal curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. The scientific and medical world is amazed at the work being effected. Noted physicians in prominent medical institutions and in private practice are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure at the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is strengthened. There is a bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. The appliances are being sent all over the world. Each one is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction, or refund your money at the end of thirty days' trial. Write for our new book giving full information and references.

gration of 1904. The grand total, when the year closes, will be little, if anything, short of a million.

Austro-Hungary, 177,159; Belgium, 3,976; Denmark, 8,525; France, including Corsica, 9,406; German Empire, 46,386; Greece, 11,343; Italy, including Sicily and Sardinia, 193,296; Netherlands, 4,916; Norway, 23,808; Portugal, including Cape Verde, and Azore Islands, 6,715; Roumania, 7,087; Russian Empire and Finland, 145,141; Servia, Bulgaria, and Montenegro, 1,325; Spain, including Canary and Balearic Islands, 3,996; Sweden, 27,763; Switzerland, 5,023; Turkey in Europe, 4,344; England, 38,626; Ireland, 36,142; Scotland, 11,092; Wales, 1,730; Europe, not specified, 143.

There has been a decrease this year in the number of arrivals from Austro-Hungary, Greece, Italy, Roumania, and Sweden, and an increase in immigration from Germany, France, Russia, and the United Kingdom. During the last fifty years eighteen millions, in round numbers, have come from beyond the seas to our country, and adopted it, or rather we have adopted them. Every State in the Union has its quota of these adopted sons and daughters, and still they come, and will continue to come. The quality and nationality of the immigrant have changed materially in ten years. Swede, Dane, German and British are now distanced in numbers by Italian, Austrian and Russian. The brightest pupils in the New York Public Schools to-day are Russian Jews, and the Italians excel in drawing, modeling and music. Even the immigrant fathers go to night schools, eighty of which institutions cost the city a half-million a year. Twenty thousand foreigners at the present moment are being taught our language and customs and form of government in these schools in New York City alone.

One day recently a representative of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD made the trip to this wonderful place, where thousands of immigrants are landed almost daily to face new scenes and untried life in the country of the free. In one day in April, 1903, which has been called the "red-letter" immigration day, 10,236 aliens arrived in New York, and during the year ending in June, 1903, 857,000 foreigners landed from the steerage upon our shores at the different ports, New York, Boston, San Francisco, New Orleans, and Philadelphia. Over twenty nationalities are represented in this tremendous influx, and when the big steamers are nearing port, the steerage decks are black and teeming with humanity, eager and expectant, for the new world is reached at last. After passing Quarantine Station on Staten Island, the steamer is met by three government boats—a mail boat, a revenue cutter, with inspectors to look after baggage, and by the cutter of the United States Immigration Service. After the steerage passengers' luggage has been examined, the hopeful but bewildered owners are transferred to Ellis Island, which is near the New Jersey coast, not far from the Statue of Liberty. If these poor people understand the significance of this mammoth figure, how their hearts, as they first behold it, must swell with gratitude that they have at last reached America!

It was a very busy time at the Island the day of the writer's visit, two big steamers having arrived. One of the Hamburg-American line having been delayed and not coming into port until that morning, the crowd was immense. As the immigrants streamed along the walks leading up to the Administration Building, it seemed as if every country under the sun was represented, yet there was only about fifteen nationalities present.

On the first floor in the main building, physicians are in waiting to examine into the physical condition of the newcomers. Those that seem weak, or show signs of disease, are sent to the medical department for further inspection and treatment. Next, a specialist looks at the eyes of those who pass the first inspection, and if an immigrant is found to have a contagious eye disease, he is held for treatment. If the affection be chronic, he is deported.

When immigrants wish to leave the old home to try their fortunes in America, they are subjected to a series of questions, twenty-two in number. On their arrival here, the inspector, who has the list before him, asks the same questions, and woe betide the man or woman whose answers do not tally with the record. If everything is satisfactory, the applicant is given an "O. K." card, which allows him to land in New York, or he is given a card marked for whatever railroad his ticket entitles him to travel on. For one reason or another, all good and sufficient, many immigrants are detained at Ellis Island, where they are fed and lodged at the steamship company's expense.

If immigrants expect friends to meet them and the friends fail to come, the new arrivals are sent to the detention room. Sometimes parties are held in separate rooms for special inquiry before a board, the immigrant is placed under oath, and no relative, reporter or lawyer is permitted to be present in any way to assist at this examination. On the judgment and report of three inspectors, constituting this board, the would-be citizen is admitted, deferred, or excluded to be deported. Their decision may be reversed on appeal to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor at Washington, and of this opportunity the applicant is informed. One glance into the detention room would convince the most ordinary observer of the wisdom of these precautions. In one year, 4,974 unhappy individuals were sent back at the expense of the steamship companies, who brought to our shores these unfortunates, most of whom were mental, moral or physical wrecks.

Think of sorting out and labeling 7,000 aliens in one day, and yet that is what the twelve inspectors are obliged to do sometimes, when things are lively at the Island. If one is familiar with the great East Side of New York, or with Brownsville, L. I., sometimes called "New Jerusalem," it is quite easy to pick out the sons and daughters of Israel among the immigrants, and their probable destination. They seldom leave the city where they first land, unless it is to go to another city. There is no chance for trade or barter in the wide-open fields of the western farm country, and there are few representatives of the Jewish race coming here who have the physique to till the ground. The awful "sweat-shops" and crowded clothing factories swallow them up, where they toil endlessly for small wages and to support large families.

One little group caught the writer's eye—a young man with his wife and baby. There was nothing remarkable about them; their prototypes arrive here by the thousands. It was the woman's dress which arrested attention. This garment was made with the tightest of waists, and the most voluminous of skirts. The dress was evidently new, and donned for the first time for this grand occasion, the day of landing in America. It was made of pink-and-white brocade silk, of the cheapest and flimsiest kind, thin as paper, and as easily crushed, but whatever might have been lacking in material was made up in the vividness of coloring. White lace, coarse and stringy, trimmed the waist and sleeves, and jewelry (glass and brass), twinkled in ears and on the broad bosom. Fancy combs and pins lighted up the dusky braids, which were guiltless of any other covering. Between the father and mother sat a baby, apparently about a year old, dressed as a replica of its mother, excepting the hair ornaments. This oversight might be accounted for by the fact of the baby's head being nearly bald, after the manner of babies of that tender age. There is nothing pathetic about this laughing, happy couple, but they are extremely picturesque as they sit both talking and gesticulating at once, with no eyes for anything but each other and the baby.

The majority of the immigrants, however, are pathetic, sad-looking lot. The women are bowed beneath heavy burdens, in many instances with babies in their arms and little children clinging to their skirts. Here comes an anxious-looking woman, with a big bundle upon her back, under which she bends nearly double; another heavy pack is slung in front, while in each hand she carries a heavy trunk-like box. Trotting along by her side, almost running to keep up with the vigorous stride of their mother, are two little girls, dressed like little old women, in tight-fitting waists and skirts which touch the ground, while over each head is draped the inevitable kerchief. On one arm swings a large bag, and in the other hand each child carries a tiny chair, from the size, evidently, its own personal property. The chair-frames are unmistakably homemade, carved out with a jack-knife, and neither paint nor stain cover the newness of the freshly-cut wood. The seats are rush-bottomed, the finished article no doubt being the work of some kind relative left behind in the old home.

On yonder bench sits a flaxen-haired, blue-eyed girl of sixteen. The visitor, struck with the girl's appearance, spoke to her, not expecting a reply, as the girl seemed so unmistakably Scandinavian. What was the visitor's surprise, as she answered, "Me name is Norah, ar me goin' to me uncle, a praste in Buffalo, thanks be!"

There are many Catholics among these crowds, and many Jews; but one among them seemed pleased with the gift of a Bible Testament, which the representatives of the American Bible Society and other agents of different religious denominations distribute. A fierce, good-looking Italian, was offered a Testament. His coat softened, his tattered hat came off, and the book was eagerly looked into.

Bibles and Testaments and other religious books are distributed among these people, who daily crowd the place, and seldom is any refused. While the missionaries are diligent in disseminating the Gospel light, they also find constant opportunities for helping those in physical and material distress. They assist in bringing together friends who have become separated; clothing is provided for needy and suffering children, and all these kindnesses are appreciated by these poor strangers in a strange land. They remember with gratitude all who have a kind word for them. Home missions are doing much to surround immigrants with good influences.

A RELIGIOUS MEETING IN THE ROOMS OF THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, ST. PETERSBURG

A Russo-American Y. M. C. A.

APPROVED BY THE CZARINA, PATRONIZED BY THE NOBLES, IT IS NOW OPENED IN ST. PETERSBURG

WHILE, at the present time, the international relations between the United States and Russia are far from being as agreeable as they were some five years ago, it is interesting to learn that there has been founded in St. Petersburg by an American, a Society very similar in its spirit and method to the Young Men's Christian Association, in the development of which both Americans and Russians are actively co-operating.

The Society is carrying on its work almost exclusively for Russian young men and in hearty accord with the Russian government. The excellent work done for the young men of Paris by a similar Society greatly impressed a young Russian noble, who was present at a meeting in the Association in the French capital, and he expressed the wish that such an institution might be established in Russia. His wish came to the ears of Mr. James Stokes of New York, who had taken an active interest in the development of the Paris Association, and who determined to act upon the suggestion of the young Russian.

An interview with the Czarina, Alexandra Feodorovna, was secured, and the character and methods of the proposed Society were made known to her. Her Majesty was greatly interested, and looked upon the undertaking with favor. This fact induced one of the prominent nobles of the Imperial Court, His Highness Prince Alexander Petrovitch, of Oldenburg, who is closely related to the Emperor, to take the proposed Society under his protection. The Director of the Imperial Secret Police at that time, M. Zvoliansky, himself drew up the proposed statutes in a most liberal manner; and, on nomination of the Prince of Oldenburg, the former Assistant Chief of Police of the city of St. Petersburg became president of the council. Prince Platon Obolensky, a representative of one of the leading noble families of Russia, and Senator Nicolas Tagantseff, a leading Russian jurist, also became members of it, and their numbers were increased by several other prominent Russians, and by the European representative of the Westinghouse Company, W. E. Smith, and Mr. Franklin Gaylord, of New York, who, during six years, had labored successfully in the development of the work in Paris.

The Society was inaugurated on October 3, 1900, in the presence of a distinguished company of Russians and Americans, the American Embassy being represented by H. H. D. Peirce, at present Third Assistant Secretary of State. Mr. Stokes had gone to St. Petersburg especially to be present. Handsome rooms were lectures, concerts and excursions into the country, were exceedingly popular. Two orchestras were organized, and instruction was given in vocal music to numbers of young men who are thirsting for knowledge, and young men.

Additional rooms were engaged in neighboring buildings, and the Society became most favorably known throughout the city. St. Petersburg is full of young men who are thirsting for knowledge, and who desire to complete a most defective education. They can scarcely find words to express their delight in the Association.

The Russian nobility and representatives of the merchant class became also interested, and lecturers of the greatest distinction, historians, astronomers, scientists and leading men of letters have been quick to give their assistance.

There are many helpful and attractive features in connection with the Society's work in the Russian capital. In the reading-room, which is well patronized, may be found all the leading Russian weeklies, with not a few from other lands. The Literary Society has a large membership and its meetings are exceedingly interesting, and show an appreciation of the Society's efforts in that direction. There is a small, compact library for the use of the members.

Nothing could be more inspiring than the gatherings at the Evening Classes, each class under its own professors and every student intent upon his work. The rooms in which these classes meet are large and handsome, and capable of accommodating good-sized audiences. That there may be opportunity for recreation as well as study, there are the gymnasium and game room, each thoroughly equipped in its way, after the most modern methods. There is, moreover, a well-supplied buffet.

If the work is not seriously interfered with by the war, it will certainly take on a national character. Demands for the establishment of branches of the society have been coming in from all over the empire, and the Government, under certain conditions, has expressed its willingness to found them.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY AND ASSISTANTS
Officers of the Russo-American Young Men's Christian Association rented for the Association on one of the leading streets of the city, and Mr. Gaylord, the representative of Mr. Stokes, was given charge of the work.

The Society proved from the first an extraordinary success. The press published the most favorable notices of it, and the rooms were quickly crowded with young men. One hundred and fifteen immediately enrolled themselves in the bookkeeping class, and one hundred and seventy-seven undertook the study of German. Its

Rev. John Timothy Stone*

The Submissive Life

TEXT—Matt. 3: 15: "Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness"

EIGHTEEN years after his boyhood utterance in the Temple at Jerusalem, we hear the Saviour speak again. On the border of the Judean desert, upon the bank of the sacred Jordan, he steps out from the shrubbery that lines the stream to look into the face of John the Baptist, who is baptizing. One glance is enough. John has been calling the multitude to repentance; but there is no need of repentance here, this face is sinless. As Jesus stepped to the Jordan to be baptized, John would have hindered him, saying: "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" In a calm voice of controlling command, Jesus replied: "Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness."

In his rural home at Nazareth, he had long been "subject to his parents," ever "growing in favor with God and man." The synagogue had been his house of worship, save for occasional trips, no doubt, to the feast at Jerusalem, where thrice each year the great feasts were held. That beautiful valley upon which Nazareth looked down had kept him in closest touch with nature; his daily work had trained him in faithful service; his home life had developed of his character; and the Old Testament had been his meditation and study. The law-givers, prophets and priests of old, had inspired him with holy zeal and longing anticipation. From ancient patriarch, from judge, from king, he had gained enthusiasm and motive. As boyhood grew into youth, and youth into young manhood, his earnestness must have made him restless at times to speak the word that was so needed to reform and enlighten his day. He saw wickedness in high places, hypocrisy, injustice, crime. But his hour was not yet come. He suffered it. Alone with his God, he was learning his sweet will, and the peaceful contentment and obedience of his life was speaking with irresistible force to all.

His young manhood had now ripened, and he felt the inward desire to face the great problem of his life. Wonderful reports were coming to Nazareth from the great wilderness of Judea, which bordered the Jordan. A strange and mighty prophet had appeared, who spoke words of reproof and judgment. He warned the people to repent, for the kingdom of God was at hand. He told them to "bring forth fruits meet for repentance." All Jerusalem seemed turning out to hear him. Scribes, Pharisees, publicans, sinners, all classes and kinds, not only from the city, but from the country round about, were flocking to the Jordan to hear this man, dressed in camel's hair, and eating the food of the desert, locusts and wild honey.

As Jesus, in secluded Nazareth heard these words, a mighty motive seemed to thrill his whole being. It was not that long-felt craving to help his fellow-men more widely, but of duty. His place was no longer his home in Nazareth; even the dear mother and the loved ones there were no longer his especial care. With the sorrow of leave-taking, he crosses the plain, and seeks the fords of the Jordan, where John is baptizing and preaching. As he goes on his journey, from the solitude of the mountains and desert, he gains inspiration step by step. The thirty years of quietness are about to speak. His training is complete, and in his own humble assurance he seeks the new prophet.

John the Baptist and Jesus were cousins, but they had probably not known one another as boys and young men. It is doubtful if they had ever met in recent years, for John had been a man of the desert, and Jesus had lived a quiet life at home. John did not recognize him as a relative, nor as the Messiah, but with a keen eye and exact insight, he saw at once purity and sinlessness. The nature that could see behind the pretended professionalism of scribe and Pharisee, saw here what was genuine. The tongue that fearlessly and unsparringly rebuked them as a "generation of vipers," and asked them "who had warned" them "to flee from the wrath to come," bowed in utter humility before One, whose pure and holy life silenced him, save to say: "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" "Suffer it now," said Jesus.

No Sin to be Confessed

See them as they step into the Jordan. There is no confession of sin in this baptism. There is no sin. John is baptizing with water the One who is to baptize with the Holy Ghost and with fire. The multitude on either bank is stilled with wonder and amazement. Who is this Stranger? His very face attracts and wins.

After the sacred rite as Jesus came up from the water, the "heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him, and lo! a voice from heaven, saying, 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.'" Then immediately Mark tells us, "The Spirit driveth him into the wilderness." Then his temptation.

Our text reveals the complete self-surrender of Jesus and of John. The nature of Jesus actually revolted against sin; he had lived those thirty years in abhorrence of it. The baptism of John meant repentance and confession and rejection of sin. Jesus knew no sin. Yet he was willing to be baptized by one who knew sin, and thereby to be judged by a sinning multitude as one who also was a sinner, to be "numbered with the transgressors." Even John rebelled. But Jesus saw beyond the present event, forgetful of self-righteousness as he saw the sins of the human race. "Suffer it" was his word, the word that overcame even the scruples of the Baptist. Self was surrendered. It was the same spirit which led him to say later, "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine." The great Divine plan of salvation may not have been clearly and completely outlined in his chaste mind at this time, but the voice of one crying in the wilderness had called him from that Nazareth home to his life work. Yet there was

No Self-Assertiveness

As John affirmed, "I have need to be baptized of thee," he could have truthfully asserted himself, and the words of this prophet would have been verified, for John had said repeatedly, "I am not that prophet. I am but a voice crying in the wilderness, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.'" There cometh One mightier than I; I am not worthy to unloose his shoes. He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." But no, he would not assert himself. This was not his Father's plan. "Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness." Self should not control; he was surrendered unconditionally to the Father's will.

John's self-surrender was manifest also. The simple word of Jesus was enough. It is hard for a true genuine life to submit silently when overestimated. Something within revolts. The propriety of fulfilling all righteousness was the explanation with which Jesus turned John's thoughts from self. Self had little hold on this hero of the desert at best. From early childhood he had denied himself.

Sacrifice had become his daily soul-food. His body he had kept under. But this was a new test. He did not know Jesus as the Christ. His own testimony is, "I knew him not, but he that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, 'Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost.'" And I saw and bare record that this is the Son of God." Before that divine sign had been given, John saw the pure, sinless face, and knew that this was no subject for baptism; yet at his command he yielded. Self would not assert itself. His was a holy life. He had early learned to give up. Giving up self is always a remarkable test of true piety. How many earnest Christians have never learned this precious lesson, and what sad consequences the Church has suffered. So often in the midst of duty, when we know we are in the right, the Nazarene says softly, "Suffer it now," but we hear not, or heed not, his voice, and there is no fulfilling of righteousness, no heavenly vision, and no Father's voice; hence we do not bear record of the Son of God.

The Baptist's Surrender

Quickly John yielded, yielded against that which he felt must be right, yielded against his own best judgment, but in yielding became a part of God's all-glorious plan, and received in that very hour the manifestation of his Messiah. Self-surrender is no mere happy ideal, but must be a daily, hourly reality in the life of every one of us. Giving up is the hardest of all our Christian duties, but what results would come if we would listen to the Saviour's, "Suffer it to be so now." The "I wills" and "I won'ts" have been the hidden rocks that have wrecked many a noble vessel on life's sea. A surrendered life is a life where self is lost in service, a service in which all is subject to the sweet will of God—our wills lost in his.

This self-surrender emphasizes the important, and leaves the unimportant. Righteousness must be fulfilled. To show the worthiness of Jesus or of John in this symbol of baptism was not comparable in importance with the fulfilling of righteousness. Formality would have said, "No, I will not baptize thee; thou must baptize me." But formality is not to hold first place. Prophecy would have been broken. There would have been no declaration. The multitudes would have been confounded, God's plan would not have been carried out. When form robs worship of the Saviour's individual word and direction, then the church of God is robbed of power, for there is no vision and no assurance. The great essentials of truth will never give way to the mere technicalities of form, no matter how beautiful and blessed they may be. This applies equally to the individual. How often we lose because we demand that which may be proper and right, but which is really of very little vital importance. We defend and demand it as if without it life would not be worth living; and all the time it is of little or no value. We refuse to comply with certain conditions unless minor details exactly suit us. Numerous opportunities for development and widened friendship go by default, because of our deference to unimportant customs, or our fear of slight criticism. The function of state which would increase our influence and reveal our courteous attention, is not attended because we do not possess a new suit.

The force of our own inconsistency in this particular is repeatedly seen in the relationship of our business to the home. Many a man is so eager and strenuous in his business interests that his home is the last place in his practical affection. That boy of yours is only a child in twenty years he will be a man a citizen. Business so absorbs your life that you do not know what he is really doing with whom he is playing, and little or nothing about the school which he attends, to say nothing of the character of the teachers who instruct him. He gets an occasional glimpse of you, and then knows you as one who exerts paralyzing authority. He may read books which are not worthy the name of literature.

A Duty Neglected

Just here let me warn you that the realistic school of fiction which is teaching us to-day that it is necessary to show the blackness and horrors of sin to the youth that he may guard against it, is not only a false school, but is dangerous and wicked in its results. The curious and eager youth longs to test that about which he reads, and through the influence of such reading he sees life's day under a cloud and in a storm, instead of gaining the inspiration and clear vision of the pure sunshine. Know something, the of the books which your boy reads; meet his playmates, and take a few hours to play with them if possible, and thus keep the boy alive in yourself. Visit his school, know his teacher, and let her know your home. This will emphasize the important in home training, for, after all, by making your business the all-important, and this the unimportant, you leave your boy even millions of money, and do not leave him character, that which you have accumulated for him will probably ruin his ruin. It may be impossible for you to attain to your ideal in the large and complete development of your business if you pay proper attention to your life, but "suffer it to be so, now." "Is not life more than meat? the body more than raiment?" Is not the character of our home and child the fulfilment of righteousness, which is most becoming and best? Is not quality more than quantity? What your boy has is the unimportant, while this, is the important.

Self-surrender is seen also in Jesus' desire to live in harmony with God's entire plan. He was not willing to act independently. We see this in his expression, "to fulfil all righteousness." To accomplish this, he was a part of the great whole. He who is all in all, took upon himself the form of a servant. One who was to work out the salvation of all men in his own personal sacrifice.

Willing to Limit Himself that others might do their part. He did not say to John, "It becometh me to fulfil all righteousness," but "it becometh us." He would work with others. He would have John feel that his own work ended when the Holy Spirit manifested to him the Messiahship of Jesus. During those weeks of trial which followed in the silent, patient suffering of lonely prison, he was comforted in the consciousness of this very fact, that this was a part of God's plan. Together Jesus, he was still "fulfilling all righteousness," although Jesus was now preaching repentance, and his own voice was silenced. Co-operation is God's rule, not monopoly; interdenominationalism, sectarianism. Christian loyalty has a narrow definition, for the God who uses, and the denomination in which we worship, loves the world.

The self-surrender of Jesus led him to conform to the unnecessary, because he saw the necessity of others. By so doing he affirmed the power of example. Should the Pure One be baptized? Yes. Because he remembered the prophetic words of the holy Isaiah, "Come ye

*Preached in Brown Memorial Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, Md.

Let us reason together, though your robes be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow, though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

He began to do and to teach. The public confession has always been an incentive to some Christians. "Why unite with the church of Christ? There are other ways of confessing him. My life is consistent life, the Golden Rule has become my rule of living; the teaching of Jesus my daily precept and practice. Very many within the church have no standard, and are inconsiderate and careless." All this is undoubtedly true, yet no life to-day can consider itself consistent or pure when paralleled with the life of Jesus, and he let John baptize him. "I have need to be baptized of thee, al comest thou to me?" "Suffer it," was the response, "it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." The church of Jesus is a divine institution. By confessing him, and uniting with his church, we put our own unworthiness and his all-sufficient redemptive love. It is not our mission or privilege to judge others, the hypocrite came even to the baptism of John, but his attitude and inconsistency had no influence in deterring Jesus from fulfilling all righteousness. For him to be stood apart would have turned the attention of men from the theme of John, "repent and be baptized," and countless ones who needed this teaching and confession would have continued in unrepented sin. The responsibility of a Christian man is not simply that of the deed which he performs, but of the attitude which he assumes to Christian institutions and customs. Example is not alone related only to the negative command, "Thou shalt not," as seen in those words, "If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat," for Christ's word and example were positive, "Suffer it, . . . it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."

We see the result of the self-surrender in the vision seen by Jesus and John alone. As Jesus faced the fiery temptation of the wilderness immediately after, and as John went on in his wonderful preaching until the usurping power of a sinful monarch imprisoned him, how constantly they saw again the spiritual vision which revealed Christ's deity! Hear John as he speaks to those early apostles: "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world." To hear him speak was to heed him for we read: "They heard him speak, and followed Jesus." The Christian with the soul-vision of the Christ has a power which the world cannot have. Intellectuality, scholarship, genius, marvel at the simplicity of this gift. It wins, it draws, it converts.

Like some bright dream that comes unsought,
When slumbers o'er me roll,
Thine image ever fills my thought,
And charms my ravished soul.

From this time on John verifies his words. "He must increase, but I must decrease." But the decrease of John meant not only the increase of Christ, but John's increased vision of the Christ. Self-surrender was like the closing of John's eyes upon the things of self, only that he might open them upon the realities of Jesus Christ his Messiah.

The words of our text finally teach us most forcibly that the life of self-surrender ultimately results in the right adjustment of all things. Christ's word "now," "suffer it now," suggests or implies a temporary condition. The "now" points to a "then." How closely related are those words of Paul, "Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face; now we know in part, then we shall know even as also we are known." What wonderful characters stand before us in the "now." Jesus the Christ, and John the Baptist, the one of whom Christ said, "None greater is born of women," but these were the temporary days, this the temporary scene, this the "now," Christ's eternal "then" is heaven, the real life of John the Baptist a life for eternity. The "then" of their lives was a synonym of forever.

Considering this, is it strange that the quiet voice of the Master replied to John, "Never mind for now, permit this sacred rite to be thus carried out; I do not question your right or justice in the matter, but give up, 'suffer it now': The present arrangement is in accord with my Father's plan, and by conforming together we fulfill the righteous judgment of his will." John did not discuss the matter. Why should we fill our hearts and minds with unprofitable discussion as to life's rights and wrongs, life's failures or successes, the mysteries of an unseen Hand? Why fret over the uneven distribution of wealth, the sudden disaster or the misplaced confidence? All this is the "now" of life. "Suffer it," the adjustment is sure and absolute. "All things work together for good to them that love God."

The life surrendered to his will may see to-day nothing but disorder and confusion, but a never erring Hand is guiding and will transform this chaos into order.

Careless seems the great avenger.
History's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness
Twixt old systems and the Word;
Truth forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne,
Yet that scaffold sways the future
And beyond the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow

The story is told of a little lad who had just learned his letters. His father overheard him praying as he knelt by his little bed. After asking God to hear him, he began going over his letters, "A B C D" and then quietly closed his prayer. The father asked him what he meant, and the response quickly came, "I don't know just what I want, but God knows, and he will put the letters together, for he knows me and everything." What a picture of simple faith and divine adjustment! We, too, are little children. All life's experiences are but the alphabet of the great realities of eternal language. "Except ye be converted, and become as little children," . . . Let us leave then the spelling out of life's great eternal plan to Him who knows every one. We misspell and misquote and disarrange. But this is the "now," his final adjustment will be correct. Thus the self-surrendered life is the simple life, the quiet truthful life, perchance the lonely life, but "suffer it to be so now: for so it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness."

New York's Subway Opened

At seven o'clock P.M., on Thursday, October 27, 1904, the Subway, or Underground Road of New York City, was formally opened to the public, and anyone possessed of a nickel could ride from Brooklyn Bridge to One Hundred and Forty-fifth Street on Broadway, Harlem. Previous to the hour of public opening, interesting ceremonies had been held in City Hall, which was filled with the fortunate enough to have received invitations.

Promptly at one o'clock, the Rapid Transit Commissioners and their distinguished guests formed in a procession and marched from the Armory Chamber to the Governor's Room, Mayor McClellan leading the line, with Archbishop Farrell, President Farnes of the Board of Aldermen, Bishop Greer, the Commissioners, Chief Engineer Parsons, August Belmont, and John B. McDonald, the builder of the Subway. The exercises were opened with prayer by Bishop Greer. The Mayor, as Chairman of the Board, spoke of the progress of Rapid Transit in the city of New York, and called upon Chief Engineer William B. Parsons to state whether the Rapid Transit Railway was finished, and safe and ready for operation. Mr. Parsons replied in the affirmative. Then came more speeches, at the close of which the Mayor arose and said, "I now declare the Subway open."

MAYOR McCLELLAN AND COMMITTEE BOARDING THE FIRST TRAIN

out the tickets. If any one has ever seen a New York crowd in a hurry, it will not be difficult to imagine the scenes at the different stations. Amid a perfect babel of sound, the people surged aboard the trains, noisy and jubilant, but good-natured. Ninety-two hundred and forty-seven tickets were sold in one hour at the City Hall station. The crowd was so dense at the terminus at One Hundred and Forty-fifth Street, in the downtown station, that many were forced to take surface and elevated trains to get down town.

The evening's experience demonstrated that the Subway has astonishing powers of absorption, the way in which enormous crowds were swallowed up by this subterranean giant was something wonderful. In five hours, ending at midnight, the trains had carried about 125,000 passengers, and this without a single serious mishap. General Manager Hedley announces that the road can handle about twice as many passengers as have heretofore been placed in the highest estimates.

The story of the Subway dates back much farther than many people think. It is full thirty years since its first inception, and every foot of the way is marked by struggle. Not more than ten years ago the legal conditions were pronounced by high authorities to be "absolutely impossible of fulfillment," and even up to the time when the road was practically finished, as late as last March, injunction proceedings were carried to the Supreme Court of the United States. An underground railway company was formed more than thirty years ago to build a road from City Hall to Harlem. This company was composed of rich, powerful and serious men, but their attempts to get the road started were fruitless. Another attempt was made in the early seventies by Cornelius Vanderbilt, which also failed. This did not deter other companies from making the same attempts, only to meet with the same results. It was in 1884 that Abram S. Hewitt declared that the road to be built must have the aid of the city's credit. Ten years later, the city decided, by a large vote, in favor of the municipal ownership of the road, and an act under which the Subway was built, came into existence. John B. McDonald bid for the contract, and got it. August Belmont approved of his plans, and formed a company for the support needed. More than $75,000,000 is represented in the Rapid Transit Railroad, the bare cost of construction was $35,000,000, the rest has been expended in cars, motors, power-house and sub-stations, and in many other inevitable ways. Ten thousand men have been employed in building four tracks, or thirty-five miles of road, nearly all of which is cut through the busiest city thoroughfares. 3,212,000 cubic yards of material were excavated, of which 1,312,000 cubic yards was rock, all of which was blasted without interference with traffic alongside or overhead. In construction, 65,000 tons of steel and 8,000 tons of cast-iron have been used; 550,000 yards of concrete and 1,000,000 yards of waterproofing have been laid, and a river has been tunneled. At present 600,000 passengers can be handled daily.

Indian Problems at Mohonk

By KATE UPSON CLARK

THE constant turning of the lime-light of personal experience upon our "Colonial problems," has marked the proceedings of the Mohonk Conference this year, as for twenty-two years past. The thrill which one feels only when encountering the Actual, occurs here continually.

MRS. KATE UPSON CLARK

Who can gainsay genuine experience? Theory shrivels to nothing beside it.

Everybody knows Mr. Albert K. Smiley's wonderful success in gathering together the workers in the fields with which this Conference deals. Here are missionaries just from every part of our Indian Mission fields. Here are the very men who inaugurated the educational policy of the Philippines; the financial policy of Porto Rico; the rehabilitation of Hawaii. Almost without exception, they are good speakers. Most of them are eloquent, all are intensely in earnest. So vividly do they describe to us their various fields of labor that we fly with them from the palms of the far Pacific to the arid plains of Arizona, or the hills of our Spanish Island close at hand—and all in a single breathless hour.

Where all is so interesting, it is hard to select the brightest spots for portrayal in a brief account, but here are some of them: Commissioner Jones, of our Indian Bureau, has felt keenly the difficulties of his position, and spoke feelingly. Even his enemies and critics had to admit that he made out a good case for the Government. He pleaded that, so far as he knew, the United States was the only nation in the world's history which had paid aborigines for land taken from them. (He did not claim that we had paid in every instance. The most violent stickler out for Government glory does not insist on that.) Commissioner Jones did remind us, however, that the Israelites marched through Canaan and confiscated everything that they could lay their hands on and made no restitution whatever.

There has been much discussion regarding the boarding-schools established for the Indians. One speaker likened the "snatching" of the children for these schools, taken at five years of age, to the "roundup" of the cattle on a great ranch. Another insists that all philanthropists agree upon the propriety of taking children from ignorant or vicious parents in order to train them properly; and that the boarding-schools do a great work.

Miss Collins, of South Dakota, spoke in favor of cultivating a stronger home-feeling among the Indians.

"A few years ago," she said, "I could ride from one end to the other of my field, and see homes all along the way. These little houses, some of them with three or four rooms, had its patch of tilled ground, and usually its chickens and its pigs. Since the government has taken away the 'rations' and provided work for the Indians, the men have left their homes in order to work on distant roads and bridges. Little by little the homes are being deserted and the nomadic life is being resumed."

Mr. Seeger, of Colony, Oklahoma, said that this matter had been managed among the Indians in his field, by having them go off and work for the Government for a few weeks, a man thus getting money enough to keep his family in groceries and clothing, and then returning to his home to put his crops into the ground, or later, to reap them. He believed that the worst point had now been reached, and that very soon these difficulties would disappear. He was a quiet, unpretentious young fellow, but his strong common sense and practical knowledge made his simple statements weighty.

Friday morning occurred the most exciting session of the Conference. The irrigation problem among the Pimas and Papagoes was under discussion. Dr. Spinning of the Presbyterian Church, well known for his unselfish devotion to the cause of the red man, explained fully the case of these unfortunate Indians. For centuries they and their ancestors have irrigated their lands from the Gila River. Now, white men have diverted it, above the Pimas, and have left the lands of this agricultural and peaceful people utterly barren. During the awful wars with Geronimo, the Pimas were ever our faithful friends, saving us millions of property and many lives. They have appealed to our Government for aid, and have received some promises but no help. Little by little, they have eaten their live stock, parted with their sewing machines and other property, and are now in a destitute and suffering condition.

Great enthusiasm was aroused upon the announcement that Commissioner Jones had just started for the Pima Country, having received a telegram from the President that the irrigation matter was to be investigated at once.

Miss Collins said that the Conference had no idea of the far-reaching effect of its work. She said the traders and others who plan to outwit the Indians, invariably say, "What will Mohonk do about this?" She begged that the Conference would not become too much interested in our new islands. She said that already it was rumored in her mission field that there was no need any longer to be afraid of Mohonk, because Mohonk was occupied now with the Philippines, and that anybody might play fast and loose with the poor Indian without fear of detection by Mohonk.

The Prohibition Problem in the Indian Territory has naturally occupied a prominent place in the councils appointment to see the President concerning matter. Both of them are on fire with enthusiasm; they go backed with the strongest endorsements and resolutions from the Conference.

Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, the distinguished Baltimore lawyer, was selected this year to preside over the proceedings of the Conference. He was an admirable choice. To illustrate the craving for liquor in the Indian Territory, he told the following story:

"I am in the habit of carrying in my pocket a flask"—this he drew from his pocket and held up to the gaze of the Conference. "It contains a mixture of gentian and water, and is designed to alleviate stomachic relations. When I went to the Indian Territory, I was warned that no sort of bottle must be exposed to view. Any left in one's room might disappear. Inadvertently, the gentian was one day left in my bureau. Upon my return to my room, the flask empty. It must have been taken at one gulp," commented Mr. Bonaparte, in conclusion, "for if the had taken half in one swallow, he would never have taken the second."

A charming feature of the Conference has been the rendering of a number of characteristic Ojibway songs, by Mr. Frederick R. Burton and his wife. Mr. Burton has mastered the tom-tom, and plays upon it an inharmonious accompaniment to some of his songs. From his performance, we infer that long before "time" became a popular institution among us, the Indians had perceived its availability.

The women who have spoken before the Conference have made an admirable impression. Concise, poised, unassuming, their speeches and their manner have been alike most pleasing. This morning when the Indians of northern California were under consideration, Mrs. A. S. Quinton stated their pathetic most graphically. These Indians once owned 160,000 acres of valuable land. The government told them that they would give up this land, if the Indians would give it up. The childlike men gave it up, and claim that they have never received a cent for it. They have moved about from reservation to reservation, their numbers dwindling, and their spirit fading, until now they are thousands fewer than when their lands were sold, and they have been literally driven into the desert, and to the sands of the seashore. It is said that their lands are worth from six to ten millions of dollars. Millions are to be circulated for help for these barbarously maltreated people. Their troubles began with the advent of the hordes of marauders in 1857. These marauders found out what the scrupulous white traders and land agents of the Indian Territory had learned, that if you can make him drunk, you can make him sign almost any paper.

LAKE MOHONK, SCENE OF THE INDIAN CONFERENCE MEETING of the Conference. Representative James Sherman of Utica, made an impassioned plea for an incorporation into the bill now pending of a prohibition clause, and that no State constitution should be allowed to the Territory which did not embody some such article. Several others of the Indian Territory people, of whom a considerable delegation are here, have pleaded strenuously for this prohibition.

Miss Alice W. Robertson made the matter clearer than any other speaker. She dwelt upon the almost insane craving of the red man for whiskey, when he has once had it, and upon the helpless childishness of the Indian character. She showed that this was not a plea to drive out from the Territory the sale and manufacture of liquor, but simply to keep it out, and preserve present conditions. It is from Oklahoma that the Indians get their rum. She told a touching story of a fine old Indian, a soldier and a statesman revered by all, who fell a victim to "Oklahoma whiskey," and was crushed to death under the wheels of his own wagon when intoxicated. One of her most promising young men pupils, who was the hope of his family, had succumbed also, and had come to his death through his excesses. The strongest appeals were made to the women present that they would at once start attempts to create a public opinion upon this matter—write letters to Congressmen, discuss it in their clubs. Dr. McKennon and President Evans of Muskogee have an

The matter easily grew from bad to worse, until the tribes have literally no rest for the soles of their feet.

Through all these thrilling "first-hand" narratives, one note has persistently sounded. No matter what the speaker was a missionary from the Indian reservations of the far West, or a scholarly "organizer of education, finance, or civil government in Manila, Honolulu, or Porto Rico, this testimony was the unanimous: "The cry in my country is, 'Give us schools for our children.'" Heartrending tales were told of long journeys taken by parents, leading their ragged little ones, in order to reach the teachers of the schools. As White Wolf, one of the interesting Comanches here, said in his affecting speech, "Schooling nobody can steal from us. We want schooling."

Miss Robertson related that the Indians came here and over to beg for schools, but hundreds were obliged to go without them. "I'll war you out, Miss Alice," said one persistent beggar for education. And she said "war" out the patient teacher, who still was unable to provide the coveted school for lack of funds.

Surely streams for the healing of these helpless nations must flow from this almost sacred spot; and into the hearts of thousands of poor red and brown and black men, who have never seen his grand and benignant face, must prayers for blessing go forth upon the head of the noble Quaker, Albert Smiley. Mohonk should become a Mecca. May its work long continue.

Life Among the Burmans

IN recording the missionary work of fifteen years among the Burmans, Mr. H. P. Cochrane tells an interesting story of the land, the people, their customs and religion. Those who have read The Light of Asia, and heard Theosophists talk glibly of "abattas," whose wisdom they say is more ancient and profound than anything in the religious literature in the West, will be much interested in the author's description and explanation of Buddhism as it really exists to-day. The Burman is "a religious animal"—his terms emphasized—the idol and the priest alike represent Gautama, the only god the Buddhist knows. The Burman believes that he is the descendant of fallen angels, and therefore acknowledges no human being superior to himself. Mr. Cochrane, in conversation with a native official, dilated upon the power, resources, extent and wealth of the United States. This was in answer to the Burman's many inquiries, Mr. Cochrane, willing to duly impress his listener, made, as he says, "figures as large as my conscience would allow." Alas! he (the Burman) summed it all up in the self-satisfied expression "About as big as Burma, isn't it?" The Burmese have many religious festivals, and every festival is a feast. There seems to be little difference between the street processions of weddings and funerals, for they are both accompanied by the same distracting noise of tom-toms and dancing, and the ceaseless stuffing of insatiable stomachs. Arrayed in his blue silk skirt and gaungbaung (head-dress), the Burman meets all the ladies gorgeously arrayed in their best. He enjoys being in a crowd, because it gives him an excuse for abstaining from work, which he does not love. The Burman suffers no chance for enjoyment to escape him; he manages to get some out of everything, funerals beg no exception. He will dance and sing on the way to the cemetery, and race bullock-carts on the way home. When a man dies, a small coin is placed in his mouth to pay his ferriage "across the mystic river of death. He could not cross without this and would have to return to this world to suffer—no one knows what. At many ceremonies at the house and at the cemetery, all to propitiate the nats, the coffin is swung end-over-end over the grave seven times, to give the deceased a good start towards the great myin-mo-mount, the abode of the nats.

Marriages in Burma are generally for love, or for something that is accepted as the equivalent of sentiment. Lover-like attentions are not hidden, as clandestine meetings would be scandalous, and all courting is done under the eyes of the young lady's friends, who sit on the open veranda beside her. Under Buddhist law no marriage ceremony is necessary. "Living and eating together" constitute all the desired evidence of marriage. The first eating together is in the presence of witnesses, and so becomes in itself a simple wedding ceremony. In married life the wife is the burden-bearer, while the husband gets the glory for whatever may be accomplished. According to Buddhism the man is far superior to the woman. No woman ever can attain to Nirvana; she can only hope that in some future state she may be born a man, and so get a fresh start.

THE TATTOOING PROCESS

Nevertheless, the energy of the Burmese woman saves the race from going to the wall.

Child life in Burma is very picturesque. Every town and village is full of romping children. Boys are guiltless of clothing until six or eight years of age; girls until they are two. The parents are very fond of their little ones. The name of the baby depends upon the day of the week on which it is born. Certain letters are assigned to each day, and the child's name must begin with one of the letters assigned to its birthday. There is no family name. Boys and girls make merry at their play in the streets, with sun-dried marbles, large seeds, and peculiarly shaped sticks. With these materials they have devised games which have become national sport. When a boy reaches manhood, he must be tattooed from waist to knees, and if this is not done, his comrades will poke fun at him, and call him "a woman." The tattooing is done piece by piece, at intervals, to allow time for healing. The work is performed by a professional, from patterns which the boy himself or his parents may select. Few boys have the nerve to endure the pricking very long at a time, so the subject is dosed with opium to deaden the sense of feeling.

Men and women, boys and girls alike have the habit of kun-chewing and smoking. The kun is made of betel nut chopped fine, and an astringent green leaf, lime-paste being spread on the leaf before it is put in the mouth.

The Burmese are great money-lovers, and will resort to almost any stratagem to secure it. Among these heathen, sin is only sin when discovered; they say, "how could it be sin when no one knew it?" When these poor idol-worshippers become convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, many of them show remarkable faithfulness and sacrifice. The author gives many interesting examples of this among the native preachers and teachers, who hold their lives not dear to themselves in testifying of the Gospel and grace of God. Buddhism is not heritage; it is the result of training and environment. This training can be forestalled by schools where the Christian religion is taught. These pupils, whether converted or not, will, in a few years, be rearing children of their own, and such children will not be taught to hate the "Jesus Christ religion."

JOHN MILLER'S RESOLUTION

BY LEWIS E. CARTER

JOHN MILLER had just returned from his day's work one Saturday afternoon, and in his envelope, along with the rest of his pay, he found a brand new silver dollar. At supper time, while he was counting his money, his wife spied the shining coin, and asked her husband if she could have it. He roughly refused the request.

John was a hard-working man, but was also a hard drinker. He had a thirst for liquor that made him unkind with his money and unkind toward his family. He knew his wife and little girl each needed a new dress, but his thirst for beer and whiskey was so much stronger than his desire to clothe his family that he would spend his wages for drink instead of for dresses. After supper was over on the Saturday night mentioned, he started for the nearest hotel. Despite the pleadings of his wife and little girl, he hurried away to spend a night in debauchery. Along with paper money and coins of a lower denomination, John passed the new silver dollar over the bar at Pat Riley's hotel—there, a shining dollar which he had refused to give his wife for home comforts.

After midnight when John Miller staggered from Pat Riley's barroom and groped his way toward the place where he lodged and boarded; a place that could hardly be called home, though there was a faithful wife awaiting him there, and also a little girl sleeping innocently, unconscious of her father's shame. At Riley closed his barroom late that night. His money-drawer was full of the hard-earned wages of men and boys of Newmills. As he rolled into bed, himself half drunk, his conscience was undisturbed by the sin he had committed and the ruin and distress he had brought to homes in that community. Why should his conscience accuse him? He was engaged in a traffic which brewers, farmers, mechanics, and even some Bishops, had by their votes made a respectable and law-protected business.

John Miller rolled into his bed at the same hour, 2 A. M. Sunday. His pocket was empty, excepting two nickels, and a dime he had saved for an "eye opener" in the morning. But this was not all, his head was empty of sense and self-respect. Alcohol had driven out these tenants.

Sunday morning came. After a few hours of drunken slumber John Miller arose. His head ached; his appetite for food was gone, but his thirst for drink was unquenched. Without eating breakfast, he shuffled off toward Pat Riley's hotel. The front door was locked, but John knew the way to the barroom through a side entrance. With a husky voice he ordered a glass of beer. At that instant Mrs. Riley came into the barroom, and went to the money-drawer. She was dressed in a beautiful silk gown, and wore a stylish hat. On her fingers glistened two brilliant diamond rings. As she walked, her silk skirts rustled, and her diamonds sparkled. She had come to get some money, and when she caught sight of the new silver dollar which had fallen into the till the night before, she exclaimed: "O Pat, where did you get this new silver dollar? Let me have it, will you?"

Pat answered gruffly, "Yes, take the dollar and get out of here."

John Miller, as he heard Mrs. Riley's costly skirts rustle, thought of the old worn-out dress his wife was obliged to wear. As he saw Mrs. Riley's diamond rings sparkle, he thought of the plain little wedding-ring which he had given his bride on the day he promised to love, honor and keep her. As he saw the hotel-keeper's wife go out of the barroom with the shining silver dollar which he had refused to give Mrs. Miller the night before, the scales dropped off from John Miller's eyes, and he saw things as they really were. In an instant he seized the glass of beer and dashed it upon the floor. Pat Riley was in a rage, and demanded a reason for Miller's strange actions. With an emphasis that told of a strong determination, Miller said: "That is the last glass of beer I will ever buy. I have been buying silk dresses for your wife long enough. I am going to clothe my own family hereafter." He then turned and left the barroom.

Christian friends at Newmills encouraged John in his new resolution. His lodging place became a real home, and his wife a happy woman. From that Sunday morning until his death, he never bought any more silk dresses for the hotel-keeper's wife.

A Victory for Peace

FOR the time being, the campaign in the Far East has been overshadowed by the tragic incident in the North Sea, where Russia's Baltic fleet, commanded by Admiral Rojestvensky, perpetrated the inexcusable blunder of opening fire upon a number of British trawlers or fishing vessels. Britain was naturally incensed, over what seemed, at first, to have been a wanton attack upon defenceless men, and the government demanded a full explanation from Russia. For nearly a week the two nations were on the verge of war.

To those who have been observant of the situation abroad, several conjectures are open, by way of explaining the North Sea incident. It may have been the act of an excitable, hot-headed, panicky commander, with an exaggerated dread of Japanese torpedo-boats, and who may have mistaken the signal lights of the fishermen for those of the enemy. It may have been the individual act of Rear-Admiral Voelkersahm, or some irresponsible subordinate in charge of a section of the fleet. Again, it is suggested in some quarters that it may have been an act of drunkenness, an opinion which seems to be settling down to a conviction in Europe. Finally, it may have been "inspired" from a higher quarter, with the ulterior purpose of involving other Powers in the war. Dark and devious as some of the ways of European diplomacy undoubtedly are, it is difficult to believe that any government would resort to such an expedient.

Friends of peace everywhere will rejoice in the news that the whole question at issue will now go to the Hague. By a singular coincidence, the proposition to refer the dispute to a Peace Commission, emanated from both governments simultaneously. It is creditable to the Czar of Russia and to the King of Great Britain, that they should have possessed the moral courage to take such a step at a time when both countries were unduly excited and embittered.

Thus, one by one, is Peace winning her victories. God grant the day may soon come, when all the battles of the nations will be fought out under the banner of the olive branch.

Immigration at High Tide

ONE million immigrants to arrive this year, is the momentous announcement of the Immigration Commissioners. Already eight hundred thousand have landed during the past ten months, a number almost equal to the record of the previous twelve months. They come from twenty-two separate countries, Italy alone sending 193,296. Next in order, is Austro-Hungary, with 177,159, and then Russia, with 145,141. The type is evidently inferior to that of former years, when Germany and Great Britain contributed the largest proportion. They bring muscle and sinew, but of intelligence and education very little. It is evident that they belong to the lower ranks of their respective countries. Perhaps, not to the lowest, who would be unable to pay their passage, but to the class next above them, whose hard lives in their own lands have prevented their acquiring any education.

Hitherto the problem of assimilating the immigrants has not been difficult; but now, with the vastly increased numbers, and the lower grade of intelligence, it is becoming one of the most serious problems that ever confronted a nation. We shall make a disastrous mistake if we ignore or neglect it. Five years will elapse before any of them can become citizens, but in the meantime they are added to our national life, they form part of the community, and will exert an influence on society. The character of that influence has already become evident. The newly arrived immigrant is apt to regard our government as a government by aristocrats, like that to which he has been accustomed at home. The crimes attributed to the Mafia and similar societies; the lack of self control and of respect for law and order exhibited by foreign-born workers, in recent labor troubles, imply that old habits and old ways of thought have not been discarded in the change of environment.

The immigrant cannot adapt himself in a day or a year, to an order so different from that in which he has spent his past years. He gives force and vigor to the lawless element among ourselves, and is consequently an element of danger.

What is the duty of society with respect to him? It is clear that our open hospitality involves an obligation. To admit him and leave him to find his own way to a right attitude is dangerous for him and for ourselves. He needs to be trained and educated, and, more than all, he needs to be brought under religious influence. Both the State and the Church have a duty to perform. It should be undertaken thoughtfully and deliberately. How to reach the immigrant, how to win his confidence, how to give him the instruction he needs, are matters that demand the most earnest consideration. The problem is difficult, but some solution must be found, both for his sake and our own.

A Rich Blessing!

SEVERAL years ago, the readers of this journal became actively interested in the spread of the Gospel in the Philippines. Under the blighting rule of Spain, the native population had remained in a condition of spiritual darkness but little removed from heathenism. Ostensibly Romanist, they had continued for many generations in ignorance of the religion of Jesus. They were practically in the same condition as the unevangelized tribes of many parts of South America. The great truths taught by Christ and the evangelists were to them as a dead letter.

Then there came among them a little band of Christian workers from the United States. Soon there were a few native converts, and the evangelistic work began to take root in Manila and the surrounding districts. It was at this juncture that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers decided to have a representative in the new Gospel field, and Nicolas Zamora, a native convert, known alike for his zeal and his remarkable ability as an evangelist, was chosen to undertake the work in their behalf. Associated with him were several other Filipinos who, having become converts, were now eager to spread the glad tidings of Salvation among their people. This special corps of workers was loyally sustained by the prayers of Christians in America, and by their gifts through this journal. Zamora and his native co-laborers were associated with the American missionaries in the most amicable relations. It was a campaign for souls, with the spiritual forces so solidly unified that victory was assured.

Their efforts have been blessed beyond all expectation. In a letter from Manila, published on another page, is the glorious news that in those five years, not less than ten thousand Filipinos have confessed Christ and have been added to the visible church. Many churches have been organized and congregations established, and the harvest is not yet half reaped.

Surely God has abundantly acknowledged the efforts of those generous souls who, in the days of Filipino darkness, equipped and sent forward the messengers of light and truth. We rejoice to know that the bread cast upon the waters many days ago has been made a means of such unexampled blessing, and that the prayers and sacrifice of our friends for the neglected Filipinos were not offered in vain.

Pastor Sheldon's New Story

IN "The Heart of the World," the first chapters of which will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on November 23, the Topeka pastor has produced a story of such power and mighty purpose that it will sway the souls and feelings of men far more than anything else he has ever written. It is distinctly a problem-story, and the problem is one of the greatest and noblest that could be propounded to human minds. Strong in dramatic qualities, far-reaching and searching in the logic of its arguments, excellent in its fine portraiture of feminine character, beautiful as a love story, and admirable in its presentation of a noble life of self-sacrifice and renunciation for Christ and humanity, "The Heart of the World" should find a great multitude of readers.

Dr. Klopsch Appeals for Help

THANKSGIVING DAY is near at hand. Owing to the completion of the Subway Railroad, many thousands of workingmen are thrown out of employment. The approaching cold season makes life harder and more expensive in the great city for the men and boys who have flocked thither from their country sides to lighten the burdens of the household, hoping to make a living for themselves in the bustling city, and perhaps also a surplus to add to the comfort of the old folks at home.

Misfortune has overtaken them, disappointment has been their lot, and now in their despair they appeal to the Bowery Mission, which, for over twenty-five years, has been to the unfortunates as the rescue cities of old, a haven of encouragement, rest and protection. We cannot and must not turn them away. If we do, what shall become of them? Many a home in this great country of ours is indebted to the blessed influence and practical assistance of the Bowery Mission for the temporary entertainment and final restoration of loved ones, who but for its assistance would have succumbed to circumstances they could not control, and have been laid down to an early and unmarked grave.

The work must continue, and the kind, generous-hearted people of this great country, who sympathize with the unfortunate, will not permit it to lag. Some of them probably have among the unfortunates one who is ashamed to write home, but who may yet gain a good accounting of himself. We appeal to all to desire to have a share in the great work the Bowery Mission is doing, to contribute generously to its present requirements.

On Thanksgiving Eve a turkey dinner will be given to six hundred destitute boys. On Thanksgiving morning, immediately after the bells have tolled the midnight hour, and every morning thereafter during the cold season, until April 1st, our doors will be thrown open and breakfast served to one thousand homeless men daily. What a sad sight to see a line, formed around a city block, of men and boys shivering in the cold, waiting for the comfort of a pint of steaming coffee and a roll, after partaking of which they resume their tramp for the balance of the night!

At 9 A. M. one hundred poor families on the East Side of the metropolis will be served with turkey, cranberries, bread and potatoes, for their Thanksgiving dinner at home.

At 7 P. M. a helpful service of encouragement will be held, and six hundred dinners will be served to as many homeless men.

Scripture mottoes suitable to the occasion will be given to each and every one, and unwavering faith in the goodness and mercy of God encouraged in all.

This programme recounts only in outline such activities as we can now arrange, but gives no hint of the personal work done by those in charge. I am personally, with Mr. Hallimond and Mrs. Bird, every year at the Bowery Mission on Thanksgiving Day, and we devote as much of our time as possible to co-operating in the great work.

If any of our readers wish to share this responsibility with us, and feel that they would like to have expression to their gratitude to God for the many blessings conferred on them, for His kind and loving protection over them and their loved ones, by aiding us in this matter, I would esteem it a great favor to have them do so, and I pledge the most conscientious and intelligent administration of any contributions they may send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of the Thanksgiving Work at the Bowery Mission.

Give as God has prospered you, and it shall be given unto you again in generous Gospel measure, pressed down, shaken together, and running over.

Peace With Tibet

TIBET'S seclusion from the outside world is now at an end. The historic scene represented in the illustration on this page closes its long period of isolation. The treaty which the Dalai Lama pressed to sign, after his agreement, was duly signed and sealed by his representatives. He had accepted the protection of Russia, and by the advice of the Russian diplomat he repudiated his promise to Great Britain. He has now learned that the perfidious Power in whom he trusted, was unable to support him, and he is now bound by his treaty obligations, which he will violate at his peril. The treaty was written in English, Tibetan, and Chinese, on one sheet of paper, and was designed by the regent, and sealed with the Dalai Lama's official seal. It was read over to the assembled representatives of Tibet, and all solemnly pledged themselves to an observance of its conditions. The treaty provides that markets shall be opened for the exchange of Tibetan products for merchandise from India; that Tibet shall pay an indemnity of two and a half million dollars in three annual instalments, and that Great Britain shall occupy the valley of the Chumbi until the instalments are paid and the trading posts duly established; that Tibet shall not sell or lease any of its territories to a foreign Power without the consent of Great Britain, and that no foreign Power shall maintain an embassy or other agency in Tibet, nor shall any concession be granted by Tibet to a foreign Power to construct roads, lay telegraph lines or open mines without the consent of Great Britain. These provisions cover the whole question at issue, and having secured the concession, the British commander withdrew, leaving only the force agreed to in the treaty, which will occupy the valley of the Chumbi until the indemnity is paid. It is evident that the exchange of commodities will soon lead the way for the advent of missionaries, and we may therefore hope that in the near future Tibet will hear the Gospel, and the door so long closed against the heralds of Christianity will be opened. Let me learn to say:

How beautiful on the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace (Isa. 52: 7).

Expended Consciousness

A curious incident of loss of consciousness is quoted by a medical authority as having occurred within his own knowledge. It was that of a man who suddenly disappeared from his office in a town in northern New York, and was supposed to have committed suicide. He was a prosperous merchant, who had engaged in some transactions which were outside his regular business and had not turned out as he expected. His business standing was not impaired, but the failure of this special enterprise worried him. He lost his cheerfulness and his interest in business and became moody and morose. One morning he went to his office as usual, but later in the day went out and was not seen at any of his customary haunts. Search was made everywhere for him, but he could not be found. Two months afterwards, his brother received a letter from him at a town in Indiana, begging him to send him some money. The remittance was sent and in a few days, the merchant came to his brother's house. He said that from the time he left his office until the time he wrote for money, his existence was a blank. He had no idea how he reached Indiana or how he had spent his time. He had suddenly come to himself, penniless, his shoes worn out and his clothes in tatters. Realizing from the date how long he had been absent from home, he did not know what had occurred in his absence, so he wrote to his brother for help. It was the best and wisest course to take. Unhappily, when men wander away from God, they too often do not appeal to their Divine Elder Brother for help, though he is always ready to serve them.

If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous (1. John 2: 1).

Brothers United

A strange meeting occurred in New York recently. It was that of two brothers, who, though the younger of them was thirty-nine years old, had never met before. The elder was born in Canada, where his parents settled after coming from Ireland. A few years after his birth they returned to their native country, leaving him behind in the care of friends who had become attached to him. Some years afterwards his parents had another child, who, when he grew up came to America and settled in New York. He had heard that his elder brother was here, and for several years tried to find him, but failed. Eighteen years went by, and he had acting as motorman. In the evening the public was admitted to the line. In the first half hour 15,000 persons were carried over the line. During the five hours between seven o'clock, when the first train started, and midnight, 145,000 tickets were sold to people eager to use the line on the first day of its history. The road is really a gigantic undertaking. Its construction cost $35,000,000, and the cost with equipment involved an expenditure of $75,000,000. The number of men employed was 10,000—not too large a number to excavate 3,212,000 cubic yards of material, of which more than a third was solid rock. The road is thirty-five miles in length, a bare third of it in the upper part of the city above ground, the remainder a tunnel under the busiest part of the city. The engineering difficulties in dealing with sewers, gas and water mains, etc., have been enormous. Now that the road is finished, it is declared by experts, who have seen the systems in use in London and Paris, to be the finest and best equipped in the world. As it will now be possible to travel from the Battery to Harlem in fifteen minutes, doubtless many, who have hitherto lived in the city to be near their work, will move out, to get the benefit of purer air. The number of travelers will consequently be enormously increased. Thus, in New York, as elsewhere, we see that the prophet's prediction of the characteristics of the latter times are fulfilled:

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased (Dan. 12: 4).

Arsenical Poisoning Detected

The Department of Agriculture has issued a bulletin calling attention to the presence of arsenic in various articles of ordinary use. The department has tested 537 samples of wall paper. Some of the papers, notably one of a brown tint, contained large quantities of arsenic, which would be extremely injurious to persons sitting or sleeping in the room papered with it. Forty-one specimen stockings were tested, and were all found to be heavily charged with the poison. In case of a person with excoriated flesh wearing them, the result would be to poison the blood and lead to illness and possibly death. It was found, however, that furs were the most heavily charged of all articles of wearing apparel with the dangerous poison. The manufacturers had treated the furs, in order to preserve them, or to repel moths, with arsenic, so freely as to constitute a menace to human life. The air passing through them, or the contact of the fur with the face or hands, the chemist who made the test says, would be liable to produce mischievous results, and he urges the enactment of a law forbidding the use of the poison in all articles of ordinary use and in wearing apparel. It would seem that some such law is needed, otherwise people may be poisoned without knowing of their danger. It would be well, too, if our laws to prevent the danger of moral infection could be made more stringent. There are exhibitions, and pictures, and books that are most pernicious to moral health which ought to be suppressed.

Be ye separate saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing (II Cor. 6: 17).

BRIEF NOTES

No fewer than 100 missionaries and Christian workers are going forth this autumn to the foreign fields under the auspices of the Wesleyan Methodist Society.

Sixty-nine missionaries are, at present, engaged in evangelizing the sixty million inhabitants of Morocco. Twenty-five of these, working in five cities, belong to the North Africa Mission, while forty-four belong to other societies, or work independently.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Premiums this year will excel any ever issued by this office up to the present time.

Our 1905 "Beauty Calendar" is a beauty, indeed. It is unquestionably the most attractive wall ornament of the day.

SIGNING THE TREATY BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND TIBET

given up the search, when, on Saturday, October 15, he was told that a stranger wanted to see him. He went to the door, and saw a man whom he could not recognize. He was asked his name, and replied, "Have you a brother whom you have not seen?" was the next question. The man said he had, and had vainly sought him. "I am he," was the response, and the two brothers clasped hands. The elder had heard of him through a fellow-workman, who told him that he had once worked with a man of his name, and who had been looking for his brother. He at once started for New York and made his acquaintance. The accident of the younger brother telling his fellow-workman of his search for his brother, led to the discovery. It is so with the Christian. When he learns that another soul is seeking Christ, his prayers for him lead to a revelation of Christ to the seeker.

INTO the great gap left by the withdrawal of the ruined Le Peuple Souverain, Thompson gallantly threw the little Leander. He anchored his ship by the head and stern directly athwart the hawse of Le Franklin, and in a position in which no gun of hers could touch him, raked her again and again.

From a position of comparative security, therefore, Le Franklin was suddenly the most sorely beset of the fleet. Rear-Admiral Blanquet du Chayla, upon whom the immediate command devolved on account of the serious wounding of Captain Gilet, fought his noble vessel with unparalleled obstinacy and courage. The great eighty-gun ship blazed and roared like an active volcano.

Meanwhile, urged to the last limit by their impatient and ardent captains, the Swiftsure and Alexander, came hurrying through the gloom of the night toward the fire-punctured, smoke-covered line. Hallowell was in the lead. In the darkness he saw looming close aboard him, the shattered, dismasted hulk of a ship. He was about to fire into it, but concluded to hail before doing so. It was well that he did, for he found that it was the Bellerophon going out of action.

For one hour Darby had stood the brunt of L'Orient's overwhelming fire, and now with every stick cut out of her, with half her crew killed or wounded, with her guns dismounted, her rudder shattered, completely wrecked and helpless, his ship had been forced out of the line.

As Hallowell had rounded the battery on Bequières, a long and lucky shot struck the Swiftsure beneath the water-line, exposed for a moment by the heave of a wave. The ship actually had four feet of water in her as she came into action. A heavy detail of her crew were withdrawn from the guns, engaged in keeping her afloat under the circumstances by dint of constant labor at the pumps. Nothing daunted by her condition or by the previous reception of the Bellerophon, Hallowell took Darby's place by the side of L'Orient.

To his assistance came the Alexander. Ball chose to cut in between L'Orient and Le Tonnant, raking them both as he passed. Then he luffed up on the larboard quarter of Brueys' flagship and anchored by the head, the only one of the English ships to do so; he joined with the Orion and Swiftsure in making a chopping block of the magnificent three-decker, Le Peuple Souverain having been beaten into wood-pulp by this time.

And now the English fleet having all come into action except the unimportant Culloden, which the agonized Troubridge and his grief-stricken men were striving vainly to get off the shoal, the battle resolved itself into a trial of strength and endurance. The end was certain. The gallantry and determination of the French might postpone it for a space, but there was nothing before them but surrender or destruction.

Thirteen heavy ships had been concentrated on the first eight of the French line. With an astonishing and entirely unexplainable supineness, the four rear ships of the French fleet lay quietly at their anchors doing absolutely nothing. L'Heureux the next astern of Le Tonnant had indeed engaged the Majestic with such of her guns as bore, but Le Mercure, Le Guillaume Tell, Le Gêneraux, and Le Timoléon, which comprised the rear division under Admiral Villeneuve, swung quietly at their anchors, watching the spectacle as if they had no interest in it whatever.

Shortly after eight o'clock a piece of langrage from Le Spartiate struck Nelson in the forehead. The jagged irregular piece of scrap-iron cut a deep gash, tearing loose a piece of skin as big as a man's hand, which fell down over his eye, completely blinding him. The blood poured over his face. He clapped his hand to his head and staggered.

"I am killed!" he gasped; "remember me to my wife."

Macartney caught him in his arms. Turning over the command to Berry, Nelson was carried to the cockpit. The losses to the Vanguard had been extremely heavy. Over one hundred of her crew had been killed and wounded. Again and again had her forward gun crews which had suffered most from L'Aquilon been renewed. The ship's surgeons, with their coats off, their sleeves rolled up, were working like butchers over the wounded. So soon as they saw the admiral being conveyed to the cockpit, they naturally hastened to him, but he absolutely refused to be treated out of his turn. He suffered horribly and was confident that he had received his death wound. He sent a last message to his wife, had Berry hail the Minotaur, and summon her captain, who came aboard the flag.

When the brave Louis bent over the blind, and as he thought, dying admiral in the cockpit, and the latter thanked him for the magnificent support he had given him, the scene brought tears to the eyes of the beholders. When it came to his turn and the wound was dressed, the doctors were able to assure the admiral that it was not mortal, although extremely painful, and would probably remain so for some time, on account of the shock and a slight fracture of the skull, yet he would soon be able to be about again.

About nine o'clock L'Orient was observed to be on fire on her larboard quarter. Hallowell directed his light guns at the burning place in order that her crew might not extinguish the blaze, and in a short time the three-decker was hopelessly aflame. Brueys had been killed. He had been wounded in the cheek and in the leg, but had remained at his post until a heavy round shot disemboweled him. Even then he would not be carried below. He died on his own quarter-deck. Captain de Casa Bianca was also desperately wounded. The ship was fought by Admiral Gantheaume.

At half after nine o'clock the great hulk was a mass of fire. It was evident to everyone that she was doomed. The flames had mounted to the rigging and had caught the masts. They curled around the broad tops in glowing columns with fifty capitals of marvelous beauty, in the blackness of the night. Still her crew fought on. While the decks above them were ablaze, the lower deck guns poured shot and shell into the English, who clung to her like hounds to a boar at bay.

The captains of the Alexander and the Orion, shortly before ten o'clock, closed their ports, and veered away from the doomed ship. Hallowell, in the Swiftsure, who had the advantage of the windward position, clung desperately to L'Orient, firing to the very last. And now above all the horror of battle, the rising moon poured down her soft and brilliant light.

Nelson was told of the imminent danger and clambered from below that he might see it. When he reached the deck of the Vanguard he at once asked if any of her boats were still seaworthy, and found one which could be made use of. This he ordered to be made ready under the charge of Macartney, who volunteered for the service, to save such of the crew of L'Orient as might be found in the water.

At ten o'clock, with a concussion that seemed to rive the heavens, the great ship blew up. Flaming timbers, spars, bodies, were thrown into the air and far and wide in every direction. A rain of fire descended upon the nearest ships. Le Franklin, just ahead of L'Orient, caught fire in a dozen places. So, too, did the Alexander, the Swiftsure, the Majestic, and Le Tonnant.

The shallow water of the bay heaved upward as if driven by a tidal wave. Up and down the line the ships swayed to and fro as if drunken with battle. Weakened spars gave way under the strain, masts crashed over the riven sides. Under the influence of the awful concussion, from the terrific shock involved in the blowing up of the three-decker, the battle stopped for several moments. Not a gun was fired in the face of so awful a manifestation of the power and horror of war.

From the explosion of L'Orient but seventy people were saved by the boats from the English ships, for, like the Vanguard, the Swiftsure and the Alexander had also sent boats to the rescue. The complement of L'Orient was one thousand men, and thus, over nine hundred of them were lost.

Le Spartiate and L'Aquilon had struck at nine o'clock. Le Spartiate had not a single gun that would bear when she hauled down her flag. The slaughter upon her was something unprecedented. Le Guerrier, which had been raked by five ships in succession, had been made a chopping block of by the Zealous, which had anchored off her larboard bow in a position entirely inaccessible to the French liner's guns. The Zealous, with a loss of one killed, and seven wounded, had reduced the French 74, to a complete and total wreck. Her bow were beaten in, her maindeck ports, as far aft as the mainmast, were knocked into one gaping hole. Her upper works had collapsed. Her guns were dismounted, and she was in a sinking condition, with nearly four hundred of her crew dead or dying on her decks.

Le Peuple Souverain struck to the Alexander, after the destruction of the flagship. This left the head of the French line only Le Franklin. Among her the other ships promptly closed. For a time, single-handed and alone, she had fought the English, finally, after she had been dismasted, and so crippled as to be without power of resistance, she, too, struck her flag.

Le Tonnant and the Majestic had both been fought to a standstill. Shattered and dismasted they drifted out of action. As other of the British, the Theseus, the Goliath, the Audacious and the ous bore down upon the five remaining ships of the French line, L'Heureux and Le Mercure cut the cables after a hot engagement, and in their endeavor to escape drifted ashore.

By this time the English crews were almost exhausted from the hard work of the long day and the terrible battle of the longer night. The indomitable Ballington to take the Alexander into further action, his lieutenant begged him to give the men a few moments of rest. They were literally collapsing as they fought the guns. Twenty minutes were allowed them, and in a moment every man was asleep in the midst of the commotion until they were awakened to go into action once more.

It was long past midnight, quite two in the morning, in fact, when Macartney received permission from Nelson to take the Vanguard's boat and board the Le Tonnant under a flag, for the purpose of summoning it to surrender.

The battle was over. In the words of Nelson, "It was not a victory, it was a conquest!"

The first act of the English admiral, when the exigencies of the ships permitted it the next day, was to publish the following order:

"VANGUARD, off the mouth of the Nile

2d August, 1805.
"Almighty God having blessed His Majesty's arms with victory, the admiral intends returning in thanksgiving for the same at two o'clock this day, and he recommends every ship doing the same as soon as convenient.
HORATIO NELSON

CHAPTER XXXIII

"YOUR MAJESTY, I FOUGHT FOR FRANCE"

THE emotions which filled the heart of Louise Vaudémont when she was informed by her grandfather that the English fleet had been sighted beyond Bequières Island, can with difficulty be imagined. She had no positive assurance of course that her lover had succeeded in his endeavor to find Lord Nelson, yet she had a woman's confidence that he had not failed in his attempt. It was no wonder to him to fail, she thought proudly. He always succeeded. He had even won her, she told herself with a happy wave of feeling. She knew he was there, he felt morally certain that he would be in command of one of the swiftly approaching ships which the pang hours of the afternoon brought presently into her view as she paced the poop-deck of Le Tonnant by the man's side.

She estimated the power of the English fleet by her knowledge of Macartney, and not once had it occurred to her, at least, that Nelson would hesitate to join battle. She was certain that so soon as he could get within range the two fleets would engage. In this conclusion she was assured by her grandfather.

There was none of the fatuousness of Brueys and the marquis. He had not permitted himself for a moment to suppose, as Brueys had done, that the English would be afraid to attack them. He knew the temper of the English in general, and he knew the temper of Nelson in particular. Shrewd observer of men as he was, he had not spent hours in his company without divining something of the heroic purpose of the English seaman. He had no doubt whatever as to the relative efficiency of the two fleets, either. Bred in the strictest and sternest school of de Suffren, who was an inimitable disciplinarian, the marquis noted the liberty and disorder, the almost utter ruin of the morale of the crews which Republican ideas had produced. Liberty, equality and fraternity! Republican ideas were very well on shore, they brought nothing but disaster on sea.

Dupetit Thouars was a man after the old way of heart, and if he had had more time and better material, he might have effected something on the ship to which he had been so lately commissioned; but the crews had been completely demoralized by Garron, and there was little improvement which he could bring about in a few days he was allowed full and unhindered sway.

he did, however, do something. It is probable that he possessed the best crew of any of the French ships. As he was a man—and he was about to demonstrate conclusively in the coming battle—of the most amazing vigor and courage, he communicated some of his spirit to his men.

The feelings of the marquis as he saw the English fleet bearing down upon them were somewhat complex. The triumph of England would mean the dismantine of Bonaparte, and the advancement of the cause of the king. Therefore, from his political point of view it was to be hoped for and prayed for. At the same time a man who had fought the red flag fluttering from the masts of the nearing ships through twenty years of service, could not forget in a moment his ancient enmities. Sometimes the marquis found himself, with a start of surprise, longing to be in command. The appeal of the moment threatened to overwhelm the calm, dispassionate judgment of the hour. For instance, he was burning with a desire to give advice. He realized, as perhaps no other in the French fleet, the utter hopelessness of Brueys' position. He knew just what Nelson would do. There was a chance, only a chance, but such as it was, a possibility, that if Brueys could get under way, and could bring his ships to bear upon Nelson's fleet, he might crush it before the three rearmost English ships could get into action. In default of a better confidant, he explained all this to Louise as they walked side by side. Louise had shared the old man's life long enough, and intimately enough to have learned something of sea fighting from his experience. She realized that the battle would be fierce and furious one. She herself, her grandfather, and her foster-sister, would be in the midst of it.

There would be as much danger to them as to any one; but she never gave a thought to her own peril, nor even to that of the marquis. Her mind was fixed upon the possibility of danger to Macartney. She wondered upon which of the ships it might be. A tentative question to the marquis had enlightened her somewhat.

"Unless," said the old man, "he has been placed in command of one of the ships to which his rank and his long experience would entitle him—which is most unlikely, for no admiral would displace a captain on the eve of battle—he will probably be found on the flagship: though his knowledge of the situation might enable him to give better advice on the van ship."

All of which was very uncertain and unsatisfactory. He might be on the foremost ship, swinging so magnificently into action at the head of the fleet, nearly a mile away. He might be on that leviathan of war carrying the admiral's flag. He might be upon any of the other ships. It was even possible that when Le Tonnant and her antagonist, Macartney might be in command.

A place had been made for the comtesse and her aid in the cable tiers, but it was not necessary for her to go there during the first part of the battle. With her grandfather, therefore, and Captain Thouars, she hung over the rail and watched ship after ship winging into the smoking flame ahead, and open her batteries. She saw the whole marvelous maneuvering of the English fleet as her grandfather pointed it out to her. She alternated in her feelings between admiration, astonishment, apprehension and terror.

She was a true daughter of France. The king was at altogether France after all. She found herself torn between two desires. She understood something of the feelings which had actuated her brother Honoré. Sometimes she found herself wishing that the English could be beaten, provided Macartney might come out unharméd. Then she realized what the defeat of this fleet, and the isolation of Bonaparte in Egypt, might mean to the king. The scene before her was like a magnificent picture; an enthralling, absorbing presentation of the majesty of war. And the setting in which the terrific action took place was so softly beautiful. The sun sank to rest in a blaze of glory that seemed to mock the puny lights of men, though those lights came from the flames of cannon. The sky above was studded with brilliant stars as the darkness drew nigh. Presently the moon rose. The cannonade seemed to kill the wind after a time. All round was peace and calm. But hell itself was mocked in the ships.

The men of Le Tonnant, stood chattering idly by their guns waiting the approach of their antagonist. No shot had come from any direction on that ship. None of the horrors of war were apparent, only the glorious pomp and circumstance. Louise had not had enough experience adequately, to imagine the conditions on the doomed ships ahead. It was all strange, terrible, thrilling. The diapason of the cannonade beat into her brain; the lights, the flashes of the guns, the stately moving ships, bewildered her. The battle got hold of her, fastened itself upon her. She wanted to do something, strike one blow for France, to fight! And she was but a woman. How those men yonder must feel! Presently the marquis and Dupetit Thouars left her to herself. They were discussing the situation.

"Heavens!" said the captain, "if I were only in command of those ships!" waving his hand back to the rear division. "I should order them to get under way at once! See! The English are doubling on us! We could play the same trick upon them with those unengaged ships. We could overwhelm those three to windward yonder. I should get under way at once!"

"And you would do right," said the marquis.

"If I only dared I would take out Le Tonnant without orders!"

"There will be no need. You at least may count upon an antagonist, but the battle for the present will stop here, I think."

"Yes, yes. Admiral Brueys expected the English would attack his rear and the best ships are aft there."

"A man like Nelson does the unexpected thing, always," said the old man.

"Of course."

"With a concussion that seemed to rive the heavens, the great ship blew up!"

"Look yonder!" cried the admiral. "L'Orient is engaged! How magnificent is the courage of that 74 to tackle that great three-decker! See, she reels from the shock of L'Orient's broadside! There! she will sink alongside! No, no she holds her own! They fight magnificently, those English! But 'tis a hopeless overmatch. Spring your cable, Thouars!" cried the old man suddenly. "your forward guns can reach the English ship! God forgive me!" he said, "I forgot!"

Thouars instantly acted upon the wise suggestion. The stern of Le Tonnant was sprung to starboard and from such guns as bore, a fire at long range was poured upon the Bellerophon, busily engaged with L'Orient. The English liner could make no reply. As the smoke of her own guns blew across Le Tonnant's decks, the admiral was reminded of his granddaughter. He stepped across to where she stood clinging to the rail and staring ahead.

"Louise," he said, "you must go below."

"Not yet, not yet, monsieur," cried the girl, "let me stay! There is no danger yet."

"See!" cried the marquis, pointing as the bluff bows of a great ship came looming through the smoke to windward of the Bellerophon, her topsails showing faintly white in the flashes of the battle, "yonder is our foe! Down in the cable tiers at once with you!"

"Let me stay!"

"I cannot!"

"Grandfather!"

"Louise, if you do not obey me at once, I shall have you carried below. This is no place for a woman."

There was that in the old man's appearance which warned her that it would not be well for her to hesitate longer, so she reluctantly descended the ladder, past the men sweating at the guns in the heat of the summer night as they trained them on the approaching English ship; down through the narrow confines of the main deck, a hurly-burly of shouting, swearing figures toiling at the training tackles in the dim light from the long rows of flickering lanterns; down far below the water line into the recess where the mighty cables lay, the safest place on the ship, which had been provided for her and Aurore.

Scarcely had she reached it, when Le Tonnant shook from truck to keelson with the roar of her first broadside, which had been poured upon the Majestic. An instant later a more muffled detonation, followed by the crushing of timber, and the shrieks of men, told of the return discharge. Thereafter there was no intermission in the dreadful roar of sound.

The woman sat on the damp coils of the cables, one hand clasped upon her breast as if she would faint or open her dress, to relieve the awful pressure of her beating heart. Imagination, in the darkness, added a thousand terrors and anxieties to her soul. What could have happened? Where was Macartney? What was her grandfather doing? Were the English crushing the ships of the French? The roar of the battle was dying away.

Above her in the cockpit she could hear the shrieks, and groans and prayers of the wounded. Blood trickled down the open scuttle into the cable lockers, and fell upon her dress. It was cruel, cruel, to keep her there without letting her know! She would die if she could get no news!

The habit of obedience was strong upon her, as it was upon all the demoiselles of France in that day and age, but at last her anxieties became too much for her. Other women were there above her, doing something, playing a part. She would not remain below!

No, under no circumstances! She had been there weeks, months, years! She looked at her watch as she thought, and found that it wanted a few minutes to ten o'clock. She had been there nearly two hours! She could stand it no longer!

Bidding the frightened maid remain where she was, Louise rose to her feet, and ascended the ladder to the main-deck.

What a scene of finished horror met her gaze! As the ship rolled in the gentle swell, water and blood swashing across the deck, wetted her feet. Dead men lay piled upon the deck in every direction. Dismounted guns gaped uselessly at the sky through ports which had been battered into vast openings. Here and there a cannon, surrounded by a group of half-naked, powder-blackened, blood-stained seamen, still venomously spat its fire and destruction at a black, red-lanced something, seen dimly through the smoke on the other side.

This, this, was war! This was what was meant by that which had set her pulses beating when she watched it ignorantly on the ships ahead! Her brain reeled at the sight and the thoughts it brought to her. She would have fainted, but constrained herself to go on.

Presently she reached the quarter-deck. Lifting her eyes, she saw a frightful sight. A high division tub was placed on the deck. Propped up on the sand, or bran, which it contained was the armless figure, ghastly and terrible, of a man! It was Dupetit Thouars! He was stone dead! She learned afterwards that he had first lost one arm, then the other, and finally a leg; that he had refused to go below, and that he had ordered his men to bring up the tub filled with sand or bran, to thrust him in there so that he might direct the battle so long as he lived. He had died in that position. There by his side stood an old man, his head thrown back, his eyes shining, his voice high and shrill with excitement. It was her grandfather, directing the battle. "Give it to them, men!" he shouted, and there was so much power in his appeal that it was distinctly heard over all noise of the battle. "We have them beaten! Once more for France! Another broadside! Fire, fire! Steadily! The last shot may tell the tale! Strike, strike, for France!"

How All Should be Prophets

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS*

ISAIAH hears a Voice, the same Voice Moses heard in the burning bush, saying: "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." Isaiah appears to be standing in the gate of the Temple, and by a vision he is enabled to see within the holy place, and the Holy of Holies. God is speaking to him, and he is trying to hear. He does hear, and he gives to the world the message that was given to him. God had need of a prophet, and to Isaiah came the call: "Thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this."

And what sort of a time was it? This is best answered by describing the king then reigning in Jerusalem, Ahaz. "He sacrificed and burnt incense to idol gods on the hills, and under every green tree." He also sacrificed his son according to the abominations of the heathen, by burning him with fire. He took the silver and gold which belonged to the Temple of God, and gave it to the heathen king of Assyria. He further despoiled the Temple that he might give a present to the King of Assyria. He had the great altar which stood in front of the Temple removed to the side, and in its place he put an altar furnished after a heathen altar. He insulted God by offering sacrifices upon this altar. He afterward sacrificed unto the Assyrian gods, hoping to get help from them that he could not get from the true and living God whom he had deserted. "Like king, like people," and so the whole kingdom of Judah was given over to idolatry and corruption.

It was for such a time as this that Isaiah was called in the strength of his young manhood. It matters little whether or not he was a grandson of King Joash, as is reputed. His own immediate family was a godly one, for his wife was also a prophetess, and he had two sons of whom it is said: "Each one received a title which preached a sermon every time it was uttered" (see Isa. 7: 3 and 8: 37).

Through the vision given Isaiah (see Isa. chap. 6), he was able to see the sins of his times through God's eyes. He was like an arrow held for a moment against the taut string of God's bow, and in that moment he had one request to make, that his lips might be sanctified. His prayer was answered, and his lips were purified as by fire, an angel touching them with a coal from off God's altar. He then goes forth into the streets of Jerusalem to condemn and warn king and people alike, not for a day only, but through sixty years. And while he condemns, he opens a door of hope, even the Messiah, "wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities." He likens sin to scarlet which shall, through forgiveness, become as snow or wool. In his very name, Isaiah, meaning "Jehovah's salvation," is the fact expressed that he was the "Prophet of the Gospel."

Hear what he says: "Wash you, make you clean. Put away evil. Learn to do well. Seek judgment. Relieve the oppressed. Plead for the widow." And not for the kingdom of Judah alone, but for the whole world and for all times did Isaiah speak. His statesmanlike utterances, showing the "sinful nation's" rottenness by comparing it with Sodom and Gomorrah, to be saved from the same fate by the "remnant" of a few upright citizens, are food for thought in our own land and every land.

Illustration and Application

This national message from one of the greatest of the prophets comes appropriately on the Sunday before Thanksgiving, when American preachers, from the very settlement of this continent, have been accustomed to speak as prophets, not to individuals, but to the whole community. The Bible priest was usually absorbed with the parochial care of his altar, and the atonement to be wrought for the individual worshiper, to right his personal relations with God. But the prophets traveled about, and so felt a responsibility for the whole nation, and sought to right the relation of the government to God, and the social relations of the people to each other in business, and politics, and pleasure. This practical and social side of religion would be getting no more than its scriptural share if preachers and teachers should devote one sermon or lesson to it each month—all the better if a union service. The Thanksgiving week, in any case, should be held fast for messages of Christian patriotism, for that Christianizing of society which Moses, and Isaiah, and Christ present as the full grown Gospel of social justice, of which personal conversion, "the spirit in me," is but the seed (Luke 4: 18-21).

Isaiah, in a day of great evils in Church and State, found his occasions of thanksgiving not by hiding the dark facts, but in his God-given hope that right would triumph through the faithfulness of the few, and the coming of Christ. No man saw national sins more clearly, and no one condemned them more fearlessly, and yet his book abounds with notes of "joy," because above the throne of the unspeakable, Ahaz, and three other bad kings of his time, he saw the "great white throne" of almighty righteousness.

This is not a lesson for preachers only, for the ancient prayer is still timely. "Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets." In all, except the incidental and exceptional matter of foretelling the future, we all may and should be prophets. The words "seer" and "prophet" mean one who sees God's will and says it. Prophet means not one who foretells, but one who speaks for God, whether of past or future. The true prophet always speaks to the present, whether his argument is drawn from history or from hope.

"COME, NOW, AND LET US REASON TOGETHER"

What are the essential qualities of a prophet that we may all possess.

1. We can all be "seers" of God. This beatitude is offered to us all, not in heaven, but in this world, in the words of Jesus: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The meaning is the same when Jesus says: "Except a man be born again, he can not see the kingdom of God."

"WASH YOU, MAKE YOU CLEAN; PUT AWAY THE EVIL OF YOUR DOINGS"

The new heart is a theoscope for seeing God, just as a "musical ear" is the instrument for seeing the riches of music.

The nation's sins—we have almost lost that thought of "the nation as a moral person"—and then the nation suffers the consequences in moral, physical, and political decay, the three well-worn steps to the graveyard of nations; and then instead of national burial, comes awakening, and repentance, and restoration, through God's great mercy. The same steps are seen in individual life. Sin brings sorrow, and if sorrow brings repentance, God forgives, though our sins be "as scarlet," that is, as deeply rooted as the life-blood (v. 18).

But as pure blood from the arteries of a friend are let into the diseased veins of a loved one to save him, so the very life of Christ is poured into our sinful but penitent hearts, and this new spiritual life makes us "seers" of God reconciled in Christ.

You see that old black smoking iron boiler in the street where the laborers are repairing the roadway? The fumes are horrible, sickening, and you hold your nose as you hurry past. Look at what the dirty tank contains! They are lading it out before you. O, what ugly, thick, black, vile, ill-smelling stuff! It is coal tar. Dirty, sticky, common refuse like this—what can be done with it? It is exactly from this waste product, this viscid, unpromising stuff, that are brought brilliant dyes, celestial creations of colors. Indeed, it is so. In 1825, the oil of benzine was discovered, and from benzine was extracted by skilful chemistry, in 1856, famous "coal tar" or "aniline" colors.

Though your sins be as black and foul, they shall be as wool, as white as snow, and through the cleansed windows your soul you shall see God. That was the beginning of everything good for Isaiah (see ch. 6: 6-8), and it is the ginning of everything good for us as individuals and nations to see God as Father and King.

LESSONS FOR TO-DAY

1. Sin is the grossest ingratitude.
2. Sin is our deadly enemy.
3. Sin is persistent and hardening.
4. The consequence of sin ought to teach us its true nature.
5. "It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed."
6. Sin indulged paralyzes prayer.
7. Formal worship cannot remove heart-guilt.
8. God demands immediate and complete reformation.
9. God alone can cleanse us from sin.
10. "Now wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow."

2. As "seers" of God we shall have no fears. perhaps envy Isaiah's courage, but he gives us his secret—he "saw God upon a throne high and lifted up."

We cannot say too often that no man who even believes in God sees him can be afraid. Faith displaces fear. It is a great reproach to religion that so many professing Christians are cowards, afraid to lose a dollar, or to lose social or political favor—denying their Lord, like Peter, whenever a sneer or nobody points a finger of scorn at them. This denial, often by silence, that gives consent to some attack on Sabbath or some slur on purity or religion.

It is a suggestive fact that two American experiment men, Messrs. Tene and Ogilvie, have found that certain poisons lose their toxic properties by the simple addition of sand, though it is not dissolved, and does not act chemically on the poison. So the dreaded perils of to-morrow lose their terrors when one has that gritty courage which is colloquially called "sand." "Who made you?" said the teacher to a boy. "God." "Of what?" "Sand." Let us hope so, we sadly need boys who have "sand" enough to stand against mean and nasty and wicked proposals of their fellows. And only God can supply this "sand" of true courage to keep us from slipping back in the fleeting hours on steep upgrades of life.

The French Grace Darling—otherwise Rose Here, first woman—was gathering shellfish on the rocks near the Pyramide de Runion, when out of the fog she heard despairing cries and, looking ward, perceived a boat containing fourteen men, which was drifting wildly at the mercy of the strong currents among dangerous reefs. The occupants of the boat, afraid to throw themselves into the sea on account of the swift tides, plied their oars with the courage of despair, and shouted the top of their voices for assistance. Rose ran down the foot of the cliffs, and without losing a moment, plunged into the boiling surf, dressed as she was, and swam to the boat. Climbing on board, she reassured the sailors as best she could, for she spoke little French, and then, taking her place at the rudder, steered the boat with marvelous coolness past dangerous reefs to Pen-ar-Rock, distant about two hours. So even the lowliest become leaders by knowing God's way, and daring to guide others in it. In Isaiah's case courage was death proof if the tradition be true that he continued his fearless condemnation of wicked kings and people until the fifth monarch to whom he spoke, Manasseh, sentenced him to martyrdom, on the pretext—such as wicked men always trump up to cover their real motives—that evangelistic teachings were contrary to the law of Moses, in which, as in his words, he was the prototype of Christ. When the Russian colonel would inspire his recruits with love for country, he tells them of the sacrifice at Turkestan. The Russian army was small, the Asiatic came swooping down in overwhelming numbers, and the guns were halted a mile behind. Between the little army and the guns lay a deep ditch which the guns could not cross. There was no time to go around. Guns now or annihilated. At this juncture a whole company of infantry threw themselves into the ditch, and with their bodies filled it up, and the guns went over at a gallop, and the day was saved. The sacrifice of a company in the ditch the army was rescued. He who sees God, sees in death nothing to fear, but only the vestibule of his King's palace, and so death does not drive him from duty. In life and death alike, the "seer" of God escapes the many sorrows of fear.

3. As "seers" of God we shall abound in hope. We out ourselves foretelling the future, we borrow strength from it because it is in God's hand. Hope cannot be sent from any one who feels God present. He will not fill his hope in juggling with figures to make black seem white in the signs of the times. He will look straight at blackest clouds and sing: "Hope thou in God for I shall praise him."

Our Household Circle

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Mothers' Helpers

NEW mothers escape the beautiful temptation to be entirely occupied in the adoring care of their babies. Devotion is one thing; absorption is another. Though a mother love her child ever so tenderly, she has not the privilege of being exclusively a mother. She still a wife, a sister, a daughter, a friend of her friends, a housekeeper, and a member of society. In the multifarious objects and varied interests of her life, she must at least try to preserve life's symmetry, not to grow only in a single direction while dwarfed elsewhere. "Amy was one of the most brilliant girls in college," continued a classmate, who not having married, supposed herself satisfied with spinsterhood and a career. In common with successful single women, untrammelled by domestic ties, she regarded with a certain condescension women who, as she expressed it, "engulfed in domesticity." "Look Amy now," she proceeded. "She is not anything except comparatively good housekeeper, and a mother to Katherine. Her sphere has narrowed until it is a small circle that has sufficient space in the nursery. She is hardly John's wife in these days. The poor fellow drowns over a newspaper in the library or sallies out to some meeting or other, while Amy stays upstairs hovering over the baby. You can't talk to her five minutes before Katherine is dragged into the conversation, and I never could have believed it, had I not seen the thing, no one visits the house to whom the baby is not prohibited." The type of women whom Amy presents, makes a singularly shortsighted mistake. The truth is that a child needs its mother's personal attention less while it is in a nursery than it will later. Not so her supervision, but less her personal care. A mother who is a stranger in her household, when she might save herself drudgery, commits a blunder that almost approaches a crime. For drudgery wastes energy, vitality and high spirits, that consumes beauty like a moth, and steals away length like a thief in the night, will be productive of no harvest, and its only aftermath will be one regret.

The Selection

The mother's helpers should be selected with extreme care. The chief requirement of infancy is soothing and watching. In Southern households, in those ante-bellum days that some of us remember with peculiar pleasure, there was always a dear old black mammy who was the personification of love to the little ones. She taught them good manners, her own being irrefragable, derived from long companionship with an unconscious imitation of the finest models in the world, Southern gentlewomen. Her patience was inexhaustible, her broad bosom was an asylum for childish fears and doubts, her lullaby and her crooning ditties made the nursery fireside a dream of delicious delight. That the Southern mammy is passing is a cause almost for tears; her like will never be reproduced in the generations that go to school and college, and have no special reverence for white folks' children. And yet, so soft-voiced and deft-handed, so faithful and so kind are colored women when well trained, and so devoted are they in the capacity of nurse, that few excel them as mother's helpers. To entrust to ignorant, stupid and undisciplined hands, whether white or black, one's little children, when one would give into such keeping one's clothing, one's jewelry, or one's silver and glass, is a curious commentary on relative values. The mother should leave nothing to chance. She should know that the woman in her nursery understands her duties, has a love for them, and has also a love for children. Nobody should be suffered to care either for children or dependent animal pets who has not love for them in her nature.

Trained Attendants

In the children's hospitals, there are young women specially trained to take charge of babies, and of older children during the nursery period. They are as thoroughly taught and trained in and for their specific work, as are other graduate nurses, although they take only a course that fits them for care for children. When a mother can afford to engage a nurse, and pay her the wage to which her knowledge entitles her, she may safely leave home at times without worry about her little ones. It would, in many cases, be worth while to economize elsewhere, and secure adequate and responsible assistance of this grade in the nursery. But there are helpers of another social rank who may sometimes be found. Young women of good education and real refinement do not refuse the post of mother's helper, if it be relieved of the stigma of servitude. A nursery governess, is not precisely a nurse-maid. She should be received into the family life, and treated in every particular as if she were a sister or daughter of the house. She must have delegated authority, and the children be required to obey her as implicitly as they obey their mother, and she must be winning, gentle, and loving, so that to obey her will be the children's pleasure.

If such a mother's helper has had kindergarten training she is doubly useful in a family. Mothers themselves are the better for joining a class, and learning something of Froebel's methods. Mother-play moves an old-fashioned New England grandmother to a smile; she fancies it absurd that a baby's mother should take lessons in child-games and child-culture, but the mother's kindergarten tuition is not time thrown away. The mother who is hopefully looking forward to the years that are coming, will belong, so far as she may, to her own period. She will not drop out of every social gayety, nor grow thoughtless about her dress, nor will she cease to be a sympathetic comrade to her husband.

some early years in the American public school, or in a private school where there is diversity of rank and station, at least to some extent. During the first twelve or thirteen years, co-education is better for children than separate education. And little girls should know the full sweetness of dancing merrily to school, the full satisfaction of rivalry and competition.

Back across the years, we women who went to school in the fifties, look with eyes of tenderly reminiscent affection on our teachers and text-books. Our juniors have a fancy that there was not quite so much in our curriculum as in that offered the pupils of to-day. Never mind. We were drilled in the useful and elegant accomplishment of spelling correctly. We were taught to read aloud, so that our reading was a joy and a solace to old people and invalids, and a pleasure to listeners around the evening lamp. Our English grammar and English literature were subjects of genuine concern, and our hours of parsing and composition-writing were hours of progress and pride. A girl or a boy who analyzed and parsed Pope's Essay on Man, Cowper's Task, and Milton's Paradise Lost, who studied history under the critical eyes, as some of us did, of men who had studied at Cambridge, Oxford or Heidelberg, might compare very well with the children who attend school in this year of grace. We were able to give a reason for the faith that was in us. We can give a reason still, couched in the terse and succinct phrases of a grammar compiled by scholars, and a rhetoric illuminated by numerous examples, for our ordinary practice, in the use of our flexible and copious English tongue.

The Teacher's Personality

This is a little apart from our theme in hand, but only a little. It does not diverge far. In the school-days referred to, there was, as there still is, home work in the evening for the pupil to do, and memory has its fascinating pictures of long winter evenings when the fire burned on the hearth, and the roasting apples sputtered and hissed on its rosy edges, and fathers and mothers were as interested in algebra, geometry geography and Latin conjugations as the children were.

The high standard of the home exacted from the growing children perfect work to be carried back to school. Children learned their lessons before they went to bed.

Often the teacher was a guest in the house. He or she was much honored. The parents deferred to the teacher's opinions. The children of other homes envied the child whose mother entertained the teacher, and confidences were exchanged as to the charming and friendly manner of the teacher out of school.

It is not improbable that in the view of some children, although they would not so have explained it, teachers had a dual personality. In the schoolroom, of Spartan severity. Out of it, of angelic complaisance. Most fortunate were those pupils who learned, both out and in school, to revere their teachers, and to whom the teachers themselves were more than what they taught.

A mother cannot limit her helpers to those who assist her in washing and dressing her brood, in making their clothes, and in attending to the mere externals of their lives. The helpers, whose department is in the schoolroom, are or should be on a footing of intimacy in the family, and should maintain to it a dignified attitude.

Time was that pedagogy was not an exact science and schoolmasters were clumsy and brutal. The day of injustice and cruelty, has, we hope, had its final setting, and children do not go unwillingly to school. It has ceased to be a place of penance or of exile, and is as much enjoyed by childhood as once it was feared and hated.

The mother has the privilege of visiting the school her children attend, but the privilege should not be abused. Children are sensitive on this point, and dislike to be made unduly conspicuous. If the mother too frequently appears, either for investigation, explanation or complaint, her presence is an unwelcome interruption in the schoolroom, deprecated by children and teachers alike. If she never go, both teachers and children are justified in an impression that she has on her mind affairs of much greater moment than the education of her children.

All things being equal, that mother will receive the best help from her several helpers who chooses them wisely, exacts approximately perfect service, sympathizes with them in their own lives, and sees that her children treat them with amiability and politeness. In the home or in the school, the mother's best helper is the person who has the strongest and most lovable character.

THE CHILDREN'S EVENING HOUR

Tired of study and of play, and with books and toys cast aside, the children gather to listen to one of mother's twilight tales. How wrapt is their attention as they follow the story, sure that it will all come out right, and yet they listen with childish apprehension. Dorothy, Grace and Jane nestle closely together, but John, the only boy, seems to think the nearer he can get to mother the better. Close to mother is always a safe place when day is done.

A woman's life is always many-sided. "Society," said Imogen, "is no comfort to one not sociable." If a woman becomes exclusively domestic, she will inevitably become fearfully dull and commonplace. Her husband, in contact with the world and with men will outgrow her, and, before many years have flown, the very children she has coddled and slaved for, will outgrow her, too.

The little hands and little feet are the mother's dearest concern, but not her only concern. For as she trains them, she must shape and guide with gently moulding touches the little heads and hearts.

The Teachers

Chief among the helpers of the mother, as her children emerge from the nursery, are their teachers. After the kindergarten, which should not be left out, since the little ones taught there are happier than those who miss this delight of childhood, and are also quicker to learn, more receptive, defter of hand, more graceful of foot, and more symmetrical in their development than others, comes in due course the primary school.

One immensely valuable asset of school life for children is the gain they make in the art of living comfortably with their fellows. A child taught with scrupulous care at home, and never allowed to mingle with others of its own age, may be handicapped for life by the lack of this essential to success. All happy living in communities and in the home, is founded on reciprocity. We must give and take. For this reason, a boy is the better American citizen if he spend

Help for the Women of India

ONE of the most beneficent institutions now working in Southern India for the evangelization of its people is the Young Women's Christian Association of Madras. For some time past, it has been quietly and unostentatiously extending its influence among the young students in the city, and by its branches reaching many outside its sphere in other neighborhoods through Southern India. It is now twenty-six years since the effort to reach the women of India by this means began in Bombay and Poonah. Its advantages were speedily demonstrated, and it has spread from section to section until there are now four central institutions: Calcutta, Bombay, Darjeeling and Madras, with sixty-five branches, all doing active, vigorous work.

The story of the founding of the Calcutta Institution is typical of the others. One Christian lady took a personal interest in young women, whom she invited to her home. They responded gladly, and soon some six hundred learned to know that house as one in which they would be cordially welcomed, and in which Christian influences would be exerted. There were no boarding houses in the city in which they could meet for converse, and they made this lady's home their own. Here was the germ of an Association. Their hostess saw how large and useful the work might become with suitable quarters. In her walks about the city she saw the house of a Rajah standing empty, which was exactly the place needed. With the aid of friends, she hired it, and the Association equipped with its home has proved a blessing to thousands. The Madras Association began in a similar humble fashion. It now numbers six hundred members. It is at present occupying the building of which we give a picture on this page, but the rent is heavy, and the Association needs more central quarters. Premises eminently suitable have been offered to it at a low price, and Miss Hill, its Secretary, is now in America to see if American Christians will help the Association to purchase them. She writes:

"The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD were so ready to respond to the awful need in India at the time of the late famine, and as a result of their liberal response to the urgent appeal many lives were spared. But do we recognize that there is a much more serious and widespread famine in India to-day than there was then? The prophet Amos pictures it as, 'not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of Jehovah.' Are we going to be less interested or feel the urgency of this greater need less binding upon us? If we felt this need more keen and urgent we would respond to this call to place the Association at Madras in a position to reach the young women of Madras and South India, with a building that would adequately equip them in this work.

"How are the 145,000,000 of women in India to be reached with the Bread of Life? It must be largely Association is being used of God along this line. Where will the most promising young women be found? Surely in the large centres, where the flower of India's women are gathering for educational advantages. The place where the Association in Madras has been working, and where the property is which they hope to buy, is in the very centre of the school and college district. The students of to-day will be the leaders of to-morrow.

"The government encourages young women to study medicine by granting scholarships. When the course is completed, the student is bound in return to take charge of a free government dispensary, at a nominal salary for a term of years. Several who have been converted through the Association are now living of very out-of-the-way districts, where there is no missionary work, and are nobly dispensing the Bread of Life with the medicine for bodily ailments. Members of Association that have sprung up in small towns have been organized and carried on by young women who have moved with their families to some place where there was no religious work, because they missed the Association meetings and wanted to hear those about them.

"One girl, who was brought to Christ while boarding in the Association, went home and pleaded with her parents and sister to accept Christ. After a time they saw that a real change had come over her, and they in turn were led to see God. She devoted her life to the service of the Master, and, after brief training, went out into the district for mission work. Some of our brightest witnesses are nursing their own way in hospitals or private nursing among foreigners. Many are teaching schools of various grades, and letting their light shine. We encourage volunteer work. Some who are in their own homes take time to visit the government hospitals regularly."

Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, Mr. John Wanamaker and others visited the Association during their tours in India, and bear witness to the value of its work.

THANKFULNESS*

FOR national blessings, for the fruits of the soil, for wealth and opportunities to gain material comforts, there are no people on earth under obligations so great as we are, to tender thanks to the Most High. God has blessed us beyond all other nations. While in other lands there are complaints of hard times and decreasing business, the volume of our national trade is increasing, and abundant harvests have been given us. For these blessings we ought to give thanks to God.

For our social blessings we ought also to render thanks. In spite of gloomy prognostications our free institutions have been preserved, our government by the people and for the people has continued, and we are in no danger of usurpation, or of the attack of a foreign foe. In spite of the blunders of our legislators, in spite of greed and corruption, in spite of selfishness and the schemes of designing men, our Constitution has survived, and we are still the model of other nations and the envy of many. For the preservation of our civil and religious liberty let us thank God.

For our religious privileges, and the proclamation of the Gospel everywhere, we should be grateful. Every man has the right under our flag to worship God according to his own conscience, and need be under no dominion of priest or Pope, unless he chooses. The liberty for which our fathers crossed the seas has been maintained unimpaired.

In personal blessings we all have more reason for thankfulness than we realize. Some there are who are in sorrow. It is hard for them to be thankful. It may be poverty, or sickness, or bereavement. But in all cases there is much in every lot that calls for thankfulness. We are too much in the habit of dwelling on the misery, brooding over the disappointments and trials instead of taking into account the bright side of life. He is the happy man who keeps strong his faith in God and holds firmly to the belief that every trial is sent to develop his character and to make him better fitted for the life to come. In some instances the trouble is the direct result of misdoing. To every man thus afflicted there is an added poignancy, which comes from remorse. Yet let him, too, be thankful that chastening has come to bring him back into light. No man should grieve so utterly as to despair. If it has taught him the lesson of avoiding sin, it has effected its purpose, and God will welcome back his wandering child, who proves his sorrow by an amended life. He, too, may be thankful that God is loving and forgiving and is ready to restore.

The best way of proving our thankfulness in every case is to make some one else happy. There are people all around us whose lot is hard, let us brighten it out of our own abundance. It may be little we can do, in comparison with the gigantic need, but the little should be done. Though it be only sympathy, none but those who need sympathy can tell how welcome it is. The kindly word, the kindly deed, even a kindly greeting, who can tell how grateful it is to the aching heart. We are travelers together through life, and if we can lift a burden, or smoothen a wearisome span in the road, or cheer a sinking heart, we render a brotherly service which may hap counts for more than we realize. "O thou and do likewise," the Master said after telling the story of the Good Samaritan; it was a kindly injunction, beneficial to the man who had fallen among thieves but still more beneficial to him who plays the neighbor's part.

Disciples in Convention

BY REV. S. T. WILLIS

THE Missionary Convention of the Church of the Disciples, held in St. Louis recently, was one of the most encouraging and inspiring ever held in the history of that church. The meeting occupied ten days: two with reports of Women's work; two by the Foreign Boards; two by the Home Boards, and on the Lord's Day more than one hundred pulpits were filled by delegates.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions had two days with reports of the work done on by them in Jamaica, Mexico, Porto Rico, India, and almost every State in the country. They represent 1,897 auxiliary missionary societies in that many churches (increase last year of 267), with a total membership of 41,210 Christian women, who gave $131,398.18 to missions, and who raised enough more to bring the total up to $1,108.05, an advance of $20,000 upon the previous year.

This board has about three thousand children, whom they support and educate, in the orphanages and schools. They also have established and sustain English Bible chair work at three State universities (Michigan, Virginia and Kansas), and are planning a similar service for Texas. They have done something of the sort at a number of other State schools and at Calcutta, India, from time to time. A fruitful service is their work for the colored people of the South, where they support industrial schools and one ministerial training school. This phase of their work has branches in four States.

The Young People's Department is very encouraging, with 2,692 local organizations among the children, with a total enrolled membership of 46,063, who raised last year $27,127.56, and gave to missions the sum of $27,127.56. They also report 1,829 conversions to Christ.

Convention Sunday in the Disciples' Missionary Conventions is always a "high day." More than one hundred pulpits in St. Louis were opened to the visiting preachers, and in the afternoon a communion service was held in the mammoth coliseum. Fully eleven thousand people were in attendance. Twelve times, twenty-four elders, one hundred and forty-four deacons, and a chorus of one thousand voices took active, leading parts. The sermon, by Dr. Cary E. Morgan, of Kentucky, on "The Significance of the Cross," served in simple and impressive manner yet met at Calvary—light and darkness, love and hatred, virtue and sin, power and weakness, hope and despair. The offering of the superannuated ministers amounted to "three quarts of money," it was announced, about $1,000.

The next two days the Foreign Christian Missionary Society was in session, which presented the best year's work in its history of achievements. At a glance it is summed up in this: Fields occupied, 12; missionaries, 12; native helpers and evangelists, 295; whole number of workers, 438; new missionaries sent out last year, 17; receipts for the year, $1,378. There was a gain of twelve and a half per cent. in the offerings by the churches. A thousand Sunday School children gave one dollar each to save the heathen. All the schools gave a total of $56,832.47. The Endeavor Societies also gave reassuring reports of their interest in saving the lost, a gain of thirty-four per cent. in their offerings, and also a gain of two hundred contributing societies.

Another feature of special interest is the growth in the number of "living link churches," fourteen in all, making a total of fifty giving $600 each to support their own missionary on the field. It is interesting, both because of the increased support of missions, and also for the deeper missionary sentiments of the churches at home. But perhaps the most far-reaching of all the work, was the steps taken toward the founding of Bible Colleges, for the ministerial training of natives, both in Japan and India. Such a school has been in existence in China for many years, and has done excellent service. It is believed that Oriental nations will never be won to Christ, until native evangelists are sent among them in large numbers.

The next two days were devoted to home missions. A brief summary of the work shows that 353 home missionaries were supported wholly or in part by this board; that they brought into the church about seventeen thousand souls. For Home Missions, the churches raised $85,755.96; and Home Missionaries planted 165 new churches last year in the United States. One of the vigorous departments of this work is the Church Extension Society, whose fund now employed as loans to needy congregations, amounts to $435,184.72, the increase last year being $53,188.66. Two hundred and eight churches were assisted to build that many houses of worship, and more than that number will be helped in the coming year.

It was a happy moment and fraught with delightful fellowship, when Dr. Ball, one of the most venerable of the Free Baptist preachers, arose in the Convention, and proposed that his people and the Disciples of Christ should be united into one body. The matter was taken under advisement, with the hope that a union might be effected.

The statistical secretary's report was replete with food for thought. He showed that 98,000 persons were baptized last year, with a net gain of about 30,000. The total number of Disciples now being 1,223,434; number of churches, 11,162; ministers, 6,631; Bible Schools, 8,626; with an enrollment of 836,971. That the total given for missions was $770,717, and in all benevolences, $551,388; and that the average per membership for all religious purposes was $6.25.

The general outlook for the work was never brighter than at the present time. The next International Convention will be held at San Francisco, in August, 1905.

Disciples' Day at the World's Fair, was appointed by the Fair authorities as Thursday, Oct. 20, when a great celebration was held in the Festival Hall. Dr. F. D. Power, of the Garfield Memorial Church, Washington, D. C., delivered the historical address, setting forth the origin, aim and progress of the Disciples.

Russian Troops and the War

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Times, relates this incident:

The Commander-in-Chief of the forces in South Russia, following the usual custom, banded a large detachment of the men of his division, assembled for despatch to the front from Odessa by military train. The men listened listlessly or sullenly to the usual language, until the Commander-in-Chief reached a point in his discourse where he ventured to remind them that their call to arms was an honor, of which they should show their appreciation; that the 'impudent' enemy must be crushed, and Russia's honor might vindicated, and that, 'Men, I rely on you to sustain the country's colors unstained, and to strike for God, for Czar, and for Fatherland.' Here the patience of many of the men gave way. There was a murmur through the ranks, and one of the men shouted, 'Davalno'—'enough.' The men were admittedly in an excited condition, and their temper, it is further admitted by military men here, had not been improved by the refusal of the Governor of Odessa, M. Neidhart, whose life has just been attempted, to allow either the wives, mothers, children, or any other friends to accompany them to the station platform to see them off. Heartrending scenes along the streets and in the vicinity of the strongly-guarded railway station are the result, and the bulk of the men are now entrained by night. Further, large batches of doctors have also received orders to prepare to leave for the front. It is significant, too, that an overwhelming proportion of the medical men drafted for Manchuria from Odessa, Nikolaieff and elsewhere, are Jews."

The Sabbath Congress

CONCERNING the work of the Sabbath Congress, recently held in St. Louis, Rev. Edward Thomson writes:

Perhaps the most important thing done was the organization of an International Federation of all the Sunday reform societies of the continent. Hon John Wanamaker was made honorary president of that federation and myself secretary, with various officers in different parts of this country and of Canada.

An appeal was made to the Insurance Societies, asking that scientific investigation be made into the influence of Sunday work in shortening life. An appeal was made to Christian men in charge of Chautauquas, Camp Meetings and other religious organizations, not to run or accept the services of Sunday trains.

"An appeal was made requesting law-abiding citizens to join against Sunday amusements and Sunday frivolities, and especially Sunday saloons. A letter was sent to the King of Spain congratulating him on the part he had taken in the suppression of the Sunday bull fights in that country.

"Our Congress sent a committee to represent our interests at the National Congress of Undertakers, and they, by unanimous vote, decided to discontinue Sunday funerals, except where necessary reasons would require otherwise. Our body also sent a committee to the National Congress of Druggists, and they took favorable action in regard to the closing of drug stores on Sunday as far as possible, and agreed to confine their Sunday trade strictly to work of necessity and mercy."

Within Reach.

Because of its low price Ivory Soap is within the reach of all. Besides its low cost it has the advantage that it will do the work of half a dozen kinds of soap each intended for a special purpose. Its purity fits it for use where the ordinary soaps are unsafe.

Questions and Answers

H. B., Archbold, O. Does God lead any one into temptation? If not, why does it say in the Lord's Prayer, "Lead me not into temptation?"

God tempts no man to sin (See Jas. 1:13). The passage quoted from the Lord's Prayer has frequently been a subject of controversy. Some eminent commentators have held that, "bring us not," or "permit us not to be brought (or drawn) into temptation," would be a translation more in the spirit of the original, or, "Let us not be drawn into temptation." Christ himself expressed the same idea when he told his disciples in the garden, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation" (Matt. 26:41).

J. R. W., Newark, N. J. Is there any fairly reliable estimate of the present population of the world? I have seen many figures on the subject, but all more or less different.

In 1900 the world's population, according to the most reliable authorities, was 1,503,300,000, distributed over 55,626,691 square miles, or about twenty-six persons to the square mile. Asia leads with 819,556,000. Europe is second with 392,264,000. North America, 98,000,000. Africa has 140,700,000. South America 38,482,000. Australia and Polynesia 6,483,000, and polar lands 9,000. Europe has 104 persons to the square mile, Asia 46.6, North America 13, Africa 13, South America 5, Polynesia 2. Of course, there are many parts of the globe where no census has been taken, and the figures in such cases are estimates.

K. L. Bonham, Tex. Who arranged the books of the Bible in order and settled which were inspired?

There is a tradition that it was done by Ezra, but it does not appear to be trustworthy. In the time of Christ, there were disputes about the canonicity of Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon and Esther. The synod of Jamnia in 90 A.D. finally settled the Old Testament Canon as it now is. The New Testament Canon existed as we have it in 365. This was in the possession of Athanasius, and was quoted by him. It was confirmed by the Councils of Hippo and Carthage.

W. L., Idaho Falls, Idaho. Most of the trout in Yellowstone Lake, are diseased. They have a sore on spine, from which, if broken, a long slender worm can be drawn out, and sometimes they have worms in their gills. We caught about fifty, and all were alike, although seemingly healthy otherwise, but for a yellowish color. Have looked up encyclopedia, Natural History, and Nature Library, but find nothing mentioned about this. This seems an unnatural condition, and I don't understand it. It cannot be because of hot springs and geyser water, as there are fine trout in the streams into which these empty, and very little gets into the large lake where these diseased fish are.

The foregoing was submitted to the editor of Forest and Stream, New York City (an authority on such matters), and his reply is as follows: "The presence of parasites in the Yellowstone Park fish has long been known. We have printed much about them in the Forest and Stream. The parasite is a long, flat-jointed worm, which occurs knotted up sometimes close under the skin, and sometimes in the abdominal cavity. The worm is probably the larva stage of some free insect. The parasite is described by Prof. Leidy under the name of Debothrium cordiceps. Although not all the Yellowstone fish are thus afflicted, and the proportion of diseased fish varies from year to year, yet the presence of the parasite causes the fish taken from the lake to be regarded with suspicion. The parasite has been studied with a view to finding a remedy, but this has not yet been accomplished."

Subscriber, Hollidaysburg, Pa. What prophet is referred to in I. Kings, chapter 13, as "the man of God?"

The identity of this prophet cannot be ascertained. It could not have been either Iddo or Ahijah, for both were alive after the events here related.

Jessie M., Leavenworth, Kans. What is the coat of arms of Panama?

A shield surmounted by an eagle in whose beak is a ribbon bearing the motto of the new republic. Paz, Libertad, Union, Progreso (Peace, Liberty, Union and Progress). Beneath the shield, on either side, are the implements of war and peace, while in the centre is a landscape along the canal, with trains and harvest fields. Flags drape the shield and the eagle is surmounted by stars.

Reader, Brooklyn, N. Y. How often in the Old Testament do we read of the dead being brought to life? The question comes up in our Sunday School, and I can only find two instances, viz., the widow's son of Sarepta, and the son of the Shunamite. Please say if there are more than five similar cases in the New Testament?

All the miracles of restoration from death to life are these: I. Kings 17:17-24; II. Kings 4:14-37; II. Kings 13:21; Luke 7:11-17; John 11:38-44; Matthew 9:23; Acts 9:40; Acts 20:9-12; Matthew 27:52, 53.

Miss J. B., Washington, D. C., makes a happy and unique suggestion. Some Christians, she thinks, may wish to brighten the loneliest place the world knows of, so she suggests the dwellers on Pitcairn Island, in the South Pacific Ocean. There are now 123 persons there, all descendants of the famous mutineers of the Bounty, and they seldom hear from the outside world. Once in a while a steamer stops there. A Christmas reminder would be a precious gift to those lonely islanders.

W. P. D., Atlanta, Ga. What blessing was it that Esau sold to Jacob (Gen. 25:29)? In what did it differ from the blessing Jacob obtained afterwards from his father?

The privileges of the eldest born, included a larger share of the paternal estate, the headship of the family, etc. Esau thought he should die of hunger, and then the rights would be lost to him. He allowed his appetite to govern him, as many do now, who, to gratify some desire of the moment, to enjoy some present pleasure, give up their future welfare. The blessing Jacob gained from his father by deceit, was of wider purport and concerned his standing among the peoples of the world.

Mrs. G. M. Daniel, Lone Oak, Tex. I find an article giving "Sheep Dip" as a cure for chicken mites. No instructions were given as to what "Sheep Dip" is.

Will some reader who understands this, communicate with the writer of the above?

Belmont, N. C. Was Swedenborg insane or an impostor?

Swedenborg was a "mystic," or a spiritual visionary. Distinguished in learning, an accomplished scientist and mathematician, he could have had an eminent career as a statesman or educator, as he had many friends among the Swedish nobility. He preferred to devote himself to theological pursuits. He believed he had a divine call and a "special revelation," and that he had been privileged to visit the spiritual world, and converse with angels and spirits. He declared that Christ would not return to earth again, and that, therefore, he (Swedenborg) had been sent to spread the new doctrine. He taught that there was one God, the Father; that it was Jehovah himself who became incarnate, and that the divine Trinity was wholly comprehended in the person of Christ. He taught that men need complete spiritual regeneration to be saved; that election is the result of man's free choice; and that sanctification (regeneration of the heart) is a progressive work, continuing to eternity. The Swedenborgian view of the person and work of Christ as God is fundamentally at variance with the beliefs of all other Christian churches. Swedenborg did not believe that the Son descended from the Father, nor that the human race had fallen and that Christ came to save them; nor that his suffering and death on the Cross were the redemption of his people. He totally rejected mediation, atonement and propitiation.

A. B. J., Renton, Washington. Is there any record in the Bible to show who the widow was, whose oil Elisha increased?

No, her name or that of her dead husband is not given. Even Josephus, who relates the incident with some detail, does not give her name.

E. G. (a reader), sends us this bright little sentiment:

If fortune, with a smiling face,
Strews roses on our way;
When should we stop to pick them up?
To-day, my friend, to-day.

But should she frown with face of care,
And talk of coming sorrow;
When shall we grieve, if grieve we must?
To-morrow, friend, to-morrow.

Reader, Topeka, Kan. How is it that we read in II. Sam. 21:19, that Elhanan, a Bethlehemite, slew Goliath? Was it not David who slew him?

The statement in Samuel is an error, due to a transcriber's hurry or negligence. You will find the correct statement in I. Chron. 20:5, where the same passage is given word for word, except that the man killed is Lahmi, the brother of Goliath. The error is clear, because in Samuel, the termination of the word Goliath shows it to be in the possessive case, indicating that the words, "the brother of," had dropped out.

It is surprising how strong a hold the Peace movement has taken upon the hearts of the people of this land. Every mail brings us letters on the subject, hoping, urging, praying for the world's peace. S. M. B. writes:

The women of America will aid peace. They will not bear sons to be slain in these fearful wars, nor daughters to perpetuate a fratricidal race. The Church is cowardly on this subject. God is keeping account with this nation, and expects great things of us.

We hope very soon to hear of Peace Circles being organized in every town, village and hamlet throughout the land for the purpose of uniting in active, practical effort in behalf of peace.

Questions and Answers

Rev. Geo. M. D., Parkersburg, W. Va. Your discussion on Oct. 19, regarding Sabbath Observance, has brought to mind a phase of the subject which has not been touched. Some very consecrated Christian people let social correspondence accumulate until the Sabbath, and then use the Day of Rest, when there are not other conflicting duties, to reply to these numerous letters. Is it ever necessary or merciful to write merely social letters on the Lord's Day?

We should regard such Sunday letter-writing as simply work (no matter how pleasant it might be), which could and should be done at another time. There might be occasions when to write a letter becomes an imperative necessity or an act of mercy; but all others would certainly come under the prohibition: "Thou shalt not do any work," etc.

M. J. C., Montpelier, Vt. Where did Cain get his wife?

This has already been answered in THE MAIL-BAG on several occasions. Commentators are all at sea on the subject. Some believe she must have been his sister, and there is an ancient Arab tradition in which she is called Save, and another in which her name is given as Azura. Epiphanius mentions these traditions. The "Land of Nod," signifies land of flight or exile. The Bible narrative implies that Adam's posterity had already increased considerably in Cain's time (see Gen. 4:14, 15).

J. B., Cottage Grove, Wis. 1. How much in money did the wise men bring to Christ? What were their names? 2. How much in our money did Judas receive for betraying Christ? 3. What is the value of a mite?

1. The amount is not stated. We have had no special revelation. Tradition says their names were Caspar, Melchior, and Balthasar, but there appears to be no ground for it. 2. About eighteen dollars, if the pieces of silver were shekels, as is probable. It was the price to be paid for the accidental killing of a slave. The money was flung down by Judas, and was used by the priests to purchase a burying-place for strangers (See Matt. 27: 2-8). 3. About one-fifth of a cent. The purchasing power of money was greater in those times than now, so that the corresponding value of money was greater.

Evangelizing the Philippines

10,000 Won to Christ in less than Five Years—A Glorious Gospel Record

REV. WM. A. BROWN, M. E. Church, Manila, P. I., writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

"On behalf of the Methodist missionaries in the Philippines, I send you greetings, and desire to express to you the great privilege we considered it to be the stewards of your bounty. Through the gifts you sent Brother Nicolas Zamora, a member of our Mission, you did a vast amount of good in the Philippines. All the money received was spent in the work of evangelization. We have the hope that this coming year, through the increased giving by you and our other like-minded friends at home, we shall be able to enter in force and possess the land for Christ.

"There never has been a time when the need is so imperative, nor a time when the harvest is more abundant. From the southern islands come the tidings of great victory. One series of meetings, has resulted in the conversion of many hundreds of people. In Pangasinan, there is one town where 1,500 have expressed the desire to become identified with us. In Pampanga, my own field of labor, there is a town where we have 1,200 members. One barrio I know where every family in it but one is connected with the forces of evangelical Christianity. There is another barrio where, on July 17, I baptized 144; and on Sept. 2, nearly as many more, and that is but the beginning of an abundant harvest in that section of the work.

"There is one circuit in Manila, where we have seven chapels and nine congregations, and more than 1,200 members. They are now supporting two traveling evangelists in the provinces! Four years ago the men who tried to hold a meeting in that district were stoned. One of the men who stoned that service was afterwards converted and became an evangelist, supported by your readers' gifts. Another man, who was standing in the crowd watching the stoning, is now the interpreter and translator of our Mission. His son was another of the evangelists supported by your bounty. And these men were mightily used in the advancement of the cause of Christ.

"It would be impossible to overestimate the value of the native evangelist to the work of evangelization. Because of their knowledge of the different dialects, and their thorough understanding of native character, they have been remarkably successful. One of our traveling evangelists brought three hundred souls into the Kingdom last year.

Another is now traveling a circuit where, last year, there was not a single member; now there are hundreds. As translators and interpreters they have been exceedingly profitable to us in the ministry. And about the greatest need to-day in the Philippines, next to the need of more missionaries, is support for the native traveling evangelists. "The Lord has dealt graciously with us in the Philippines. In less than five years, he has given us a membership of nearly ten thousand souls. Four Filipino members of the Annual Conference, nine traveling evangelists, thirty local preachers and seventy exhorters compose the native division of the conquering Christian hosts who are a mighty power for God in this land. Our battle-line extends from the Bay of Manila to the borders of Benguet, and thence on up the coast of Luzon to the land of the Ilocos. More than three million people in these fertile plains are awaiting the Gospel message. Such a fertile field the church has never worked in. The only lack is workers. Oh, that God would put it into the hearts of many to provide the means for the rapid evangelization of this immense throng of needy people!

"I wish to thank you and your readers for your great kindness to us. Your special fund was an inestimable blessing, and was the means of carrying on a splendid work. We would be very grateful if you see fit to continue the work through us. Cordially yours, WILLIAM A. BROWN."

The Baltic Fleet Incident

RUSSIA'S Baltic Fleet so long delayed in its projected voyage to the Far East, has given to the world a new and unexpected sensation. On Friday, Oct. 19, the battleship squadron, after emerging from the Danish Straits, steered for the English Channel. About midnight, it sighted the Hull fishing fleet of forty small vessels, near Dogger Bank, in the North Sea. Either in panic, believing the fishing boats or trawlers to be a Japanese torpedo-boat flotilla, or through ignorance, drunkenness, or deliberate intention, the Russian warships opened fire on the defenceless fishermen with shrapnel. Their fusillade is said to have lasted twenty minutes. One of the trawlers—the Crane—was sunk, and several of her crew were killed, including her captain. The trawlers Mino, Moulmein, and Wren, were badly damaged, and several of their men wounded. Captain Smith of the Crane was decapitated by a shot, and his mate met a like fate. Some of the men had limbs blown off, and others bore ghastly wounds. The Moulmein brought eight dead men to Hull, and eighteen wounded were cared for on the mission vessel which accompanied the fishing boats. After the firing, the Russian ships, which had temporarily changed their formation to enable their guns to bear on the trawlers, resumed their course, heedless of the havoc they had inflicted.

When news of the attack on the trawlers became known in England, the whole nation became wild with excitement. There was a loud and universal demand for satisfaction and for the prompt punishment of the perpetrators of the outrage. Specially bitter were the denunciations of Admiral Rojestvensky, commander of the Russian vessels. The people of Hull were frantic with indignation over the outrage, and London was hardly less excited. Crowds gathered in the streets calling for vengeance. The newspapers breathed of war, and demanded the immediate mobilization of the Home, the Channel, and the Mediterranean fleets. King Edward sent a message of condolence to the Mayor of Hull, condemning the "unwarrantable action" of the Russian ships.

Lord Lansdowne, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Premier Balfour, were summoned by the King to London. Soon the whole machinery of the British Government was actively engaged in investigating the affair. Count Benckendorff, the Russian Minister, was hooted in the streets of London.

It was a dangerous crisis, and peace and war hung in the balance. The government took steps at once to call Russia to account, and a note of protest was sent to the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, and the Russian Ambassador in London. This note, it was stated, called for a full explanation.

Then followed a period of impatient waiting for Russia's reply. Count Benckendorff, the Ambassador in London, had already expressed regret in behalf of his country for the unfortunate affair. Sir Charles Hardinge, England's Minister at the Russian capital, visited Count Lamsdorff, the Czar's Foreign Minister, but the latter, though expressing regret over the North Sea incident, had no news from Russian sources. Russia, he declared, would give the fullest satisfaction to the sufferers, if the facts were as reported.

Meanwhile, the excitement in England continued to grow. It was learned that the government had formulated its demands upon Russia, and that it insisted that the Czar's government should (1) apologize for the attack, (2) pay indemnity to the sufferers, (3) punish the officers responsible for the barbarous assault on the fishermen, and (4) give a guarantee for the future security of British shipping against interference by the Baltic fleet. This fourfold demand, which was almost in the nature of an ultimatum, was declared by high Russian officials to be out of the question, as it would be degrading for that government to discuss the punishment of its own officers, and it could not be expected to degrade its fleet. While the controversy was proceeding through diplomatic channels, the Czar himself sent a message through his ambassador to King Edward, to the effect that he had not yet received any report from Admiral Rojestvensky, but he could only assume that the North Sea incident arose from a most regrettable misunderstanding. The Czar wished conveyed to the King and the British government his sincere sorrow at the sad loss of life. He undertook that complete satisfaction would be given the sufferers as soon as the facts were made clear.

This message, while it somewhat mollified public opinion for the moment, by no means satisfied the British government or people. While convinced that the Czar himself had the friendliest feeling toward them, they believed that the Russian bureaucracy, which fully controlled the situation, was thoroughly hostile to England. Accordingly preparations were pushed forward with a view to possible emergencies. The Home, Channel and Mediterranean fleets were ordered to be held in readiness for service. The three British fleets, under the respective commands of Admirals Domville, Beresford and Wilson, include twenty-eight battle-ships, eighteen cruisers and over fifty torpedo destroyers and other craft. It was rumored that Beresford's Mediterranean fleet would block the Baltic fleet off Gibraltar. Colliers, troopships, arsenals, and all the paraphernalia of armament, suddenly became infused with tremendous activity.

It was not until the Russian warships reached Vigo, in Spain, on Oct. 27, that Admiral Rojestvensky sent to his government any report of the North Sea incident. His version was a surprise to everybody, his own government no doubt among the rest. He declared that his ships were approached by two swift vessels, looking like torpedo boats, which he concluded were Japanese. They advanced to attack, and he at once fired upon them. When they retreated among the fishing vessels, the Russian fire ceased. He believed he sank one and damaged the other. If any fishing boat was hit by a stray shot it was accidental. He expressed his regret that any one was injured. He stated further that a warship of unknown nationality was observed near the scene. There were no torpedo boats with the Russian squadron. As proof of his assertion that his fleet was attacked, two of his men were injured. This remarkable report from the admiral involved the whole affair in mystery, and it was even conjectured that the Russians, if attacked at all, had been fired at by their own ships.

At this juncture the outlook was still sufficiently warlike to be disquieting to Europe generally. If England, impatient of securing redress from Russia, should take the matter into her own hands, the first gun would precipitate Germany and possibly France into the arena as allies of the Czar. To France, as the old-time foe of Germany, such an alliance could not be otherwise than distasteful, and Germany, too, had no special wish to be drawn into a general conflict at the present time. These two powers made energetic representations to Great Britain, urging that Russia should not be humiliated in the manner proposed. Emperor William personally employed his influence in the interest of a peaceful settlement. On Oct. 28, the tension was relieved by the welcome news that Great Britain and Russia had agreed to submit the whole dispute to an international Commission under the authority of the Hague tribunal, and that Admiral Rojestvensky and the fleet had been ordered to remain at Vigo pending the inquiry. Russia consented to detach the commander of the squadron and any other officers who may be found by the Commission to have been concerned in the attack on the Hull fishing fleet. Any persons found guilty by the Commission will be tried and adequately punished.

THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA

VERY clever instrument has been devised by Prof. Guiseppe Pino, an Italian inventor, by which the bottom of the ocean can be seen and examined. This new invention, which is called the hydroscope, is thus described in a recent issue of the London Illustrated:

"It is constructed of steel, shaped like a large telescope, pointed downwards instead of wards. Its complex system of lenses, eleven in number, answers to the objective lens of a celestial telescope. Together with its internal mirrors, they produce a very sharp picture of the sea-bottom, the rays of light passing up the tube to a sort of camera-lucida house at the top, which floats above the surface, and is capable of holding four people.

The amount of light under the surface is considerably greater than is generally imagined. The inventor of the hydroscope, himself, has been able to read a newspaper lying on the sea-bottom at a depth of 360 feet from the surface, by the ordinary daylight penetrating the water. The area viewed by the lenses at the bottom of the tube varies according to the amount of light. The water at the bottom of the sea is very often clearer than at the surface, as the sediment is capable of sinking in the still water, whereas at the surface, sand and other matter is kept in motion by the constant movement of the waves, the force of which is not felt a very few feet beneath the surface.

A private official trial of the hydroscope was made by the Italian Government a few months ago in Portofino Harbor, where it proved very satisfactory.

One of the things accomplished by the hydroscope and the raising apparatus, has been the discovering of an old Spanish galleon, one of a numerous fleet sunk in the Bay of Vigo, in 1702, and recently brought to the surface by the aid of Pino's invention. Unfortunately, during the night, the old hulk proved to have so rotted away that it rolled over, broke in pieces, and again sank to the bottom."

Empress Tsi-An's Portrait

MISS KATE CARL, the American painter, who was called in to paint the portrait of the Dowager-Empress of China, gives a very interesting description of her sitter. She says she found the old lady at times, tempestuous, but very gracious to her on the whole and comparatively communicative. She commanded Miss Carl to begin work at 5 o'clock the morning, as she herself liked early rising. She rose at 2 A.M., called her ministers together at 3, and received their reports at 4. At 5 A.M. she was tired enough to sit still and let her portrait be painted.

The Empress is seventy, and her face is very stern, but when she unbends, she can look quite youthful and pleasant, if not almost handsome, and she can be a charming hostess. She is a picture of vigor, with piercing black eyes, hair dyed jet black, and little hands, whose nails, several inches long, are protected by golden shields like elongated thimbles. She is very vain of these hands, which, according to Chinese notions, are beautiful, and she is equally proud of her long hair, which she parts in front and brushes over her ears Manchu fashion. At the back it is held by a long jade pin, like a paper-cutter, tasselled in crimson and decorated with artificial flowers and golden butterflies. At dinner she eats with gold chopsticks, talks much, and smokes. For her age she is remarkably well preserved, with nothing coarse in her countenance, and nothing to indicate the low origin alleged by her enemies. She is fond of music, and appreciates a musical box when she cannot have a band. Miss Carl says she takes a keen and discerning interest in every European novelty.

A Dying Pastor's Message

REV. DR. FRANKLIN E. MILLER, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of Paterson, N. J., died on Sept. 4, 1904, at the General Hospital in that city. Dr. Miller had been ill for some time, and his death was not unexpected. For nearly a score of years he had labored in the city of Paterson, and endeared himself to the people of the old Presbyterian Church. He was born in a small town near Cincinnati, O., in 1843. He graduated from the Miami University in Oxford, O., in 1864. During the Civil War he was commissioned as a major, and assigned to the Seventeenth U. S. Infantry, a colored regiment, and served until the close of the war, when he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating in 1868. After a pastorate over several churches in different places, he came to Paterson in 1886. He was greatly beloved by his people, and he left to them a dying message, which ran as follows:

"Tell them I love them; that I appreciate their prayers and sympathy. I have preached many sermons, but I never preached anything but what I firmly believed. It may be God's will to permit me to be with you again, but if not, I am perfectly willing to submit to his pleasure."

Answered Prayers

HELP me, dear Lord, to trust,
Nor ask my way to see;
But simply put my hand in thine.
And closely follow Thee.
Though cares are pressing hard,
And sorrow be my guest,
Still, Saviour, help me to believe,
Whatever is, is best.
And these I hold so dear,—
These precious ones at home,—
Enfold them in thy loving arms
And keep them as thine own.
So may each passing day
In loving deeds be spent,
Strong in the faith that God is God,
And, as his child, content.

Reader, Hillsdale, Mich. "My prayers have been answered times without number. Glory to his name! He hears those who call upon him."

Mrs. J. Z. Pa. "I write to ask the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, also your earnest prayers for my dear son, who is sorely tempted, and is going astray."

Mrs. L. W. B. New Albany, Ind. "He has answered my prayers in relieving me from illness, from which I have suffered. I am thankful to acknowledge it to the world."

H. "For a three-fold blessing received in answer to prayer, I render earnest thanks. Dear ones have been brought back to health. He never fails the prayer of faith, in Christ's name."

M. S. G., Otelia, Pa. "I wish to acknowledge God's goodness to me, especially his answering earnest prayers. When we are faithful and earnestly seek his guidance, he answers our prayers in the way that is best for us, and helps us to see wherein we ask amiss."

F. R. S. "The writer gratefully acknowledges the 'Divine Blessing.' Almost despairing, the blessing came at man's extremity, God's opportunity. He humbleth man, that he may exalt him. Let our praises be ever new, that we may glorify Him."

A. C. M., St. Paul. "God has given me help in trouble, and in an hour when all was dark I asked for help and my prayers were answered. Oh give us strength to trust and go on in prayer to God for all our needs; he will never leave nor forsake us."

Subscriber, Silver Springs, N. Y. "I truly believe that God hears and answers our prayers. That he either grants or denies our request according to what is best for us. I was in deep trouble. I prayed to the Lord and unexpected help came. I feel sure he heard and answered."

Reader, Batavia, O. "I promised the Lord if he would avert a threatening trouble to myself and dear ones, I would acknowledge it in this way, hoping it may help some one to trust more in earnest prayer if offered according to the Father's will. The answer came quickly, and since then I have had a deeper trust in God's love and care for his children, and an abiding faith in prayer."

E. N. H., Newark, N. Y. "A short time ago I was in great trouble, from which it seemed almost impossible to recover. I took it to God in prayer several times daily for a week, and trusted, and expected relief from Jesus. In a week peace came, and a complete answer to my prayers, which entirely removed my trouble; and because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live."

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

Japan in History*

DURING her long history Japan invaded and subdued Korea, and several times made war with China, but in every case she fought on the offensive. There was indeed one instance in which she stood in a place of great jeopardy, when her independence was threatened to be blown out as a torch by the tempest. Every student of history is familiar with the story of Genghis Khan, the great leader of the Mongolian hordes that devastated China, Central Asia, India, Persia, Syria, Hungary, Poland and Russia, subduing them, and founding a great Mongolian Empire. The last victim to this terrible pestilence was to have been Japan. Having taken China and Korea, he could not bear to pass by beautiful Japan, and finally his grandson, Kublai Khan, sent an envoy to Japan demanding her surrender. This being refused, he decided upon a great expedition to subdue her. Two expeditions were sent. The first time (1274 A. D.), 900 ships with 33,000 men, embarked for Japan, but before reaching her coast all were destroyed by a great storm at sea. Seven years later (1281 A. D.) another was sent, with 3,500 ships and 130,000 men. On Japan's part there was the most resolute purpose and the most complete military preparedness to fight to the bitter end. But what was this in the face of a terrible foe that had subdued all Asia? If they had ever landed on Japanese soil her fate no doubt would have been sealed. But before war had begun at all, a terrible storm wrecked the great bulk of the enemy's ships, and again they were destroyed. Very similar indeed was this to the destruction of the Spanish Armada that threatened Great Britain. In this way, without striking a blow, the invading army was repulsed; so no matter how much Japan may boast of her military prowess, she well knows that this was not a victory she won for herself, but that it was due to the mighty work of an overruling Providence.

A First Century Message to Twentieth Century Christians. By Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, D.D. Addresses based upon the letters to the Seven Churches of Asia contained in the Apocalypse, Pp. 217. Price $1.00. Published by the Fleming H. Revell Company, New York, Chicago and Toronto.

From Epicurus to Christ. A study in the Principles of Personality. By William De Witt Hyde. An examination of the characteristics of the teaching of the philosophers of the Epicurean, Stoic, Platonic and Aristotelian schools, and a comparison of them with Christianity. Pp. 285. Price $1.50. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

Children of the Forest, by Egerton R. Young. This is an Indian love story and makes interesting reading, including as it does life, love and adventure among the Ojibway Indians. Folk-lore and Indian customs are presented in a fascinating manner, albeit the manners of some of the men and all of the women, are rather more affectionate and gentle than the average reader's conception of "Lo" and his untutored mates. Price $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

Select Notes. Commentary on the International Sunday School Lessons for 1905, by Rev. F. N. P. Loubet, D.D., and Amos R. Wells, M.A. There is no need to describe this volume. For thirty-one years the teachers have gone to this annual for instruction and inspiration. It has given each year the main facts about the lesson, and the latest information about the passage to be considered. Not only commentary and the historical setting of the lesson, but suggestions for its treatment are found there from week to week. This year each lesson is preceded by notes on the Inductive system, which will be found specially helpful. Pp. 373. Price $1.25. Published by W. A. Wilde & Co., Boston.

That Sweet Story of Old, by Margaret E. Sangster. A "Life of Christ" written for children, including all the facts given in the four Gospels. There is no author better qualified to write a book of this nature than Mrs. Sangster. She tells the story in simple language, which detracts nothing from the sweetness and the power of the most dramatic tale ever told. There is a personal element which permeates the narrative, which brings the author's words home to the reader's heart, whether child or adult. Price $1. Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.

Among recent issues by the American Book Co., New York, Chicago, and Cincinnati, publishers of educational works, are Potter's Grammar School Algebra (152 pp., 50 cents); Goff & Mayne's First Principles of Agriculture (illustrated, 80 cents); Smith & Perry's Geography of New York (maps and illustrations, 40 cents); Niver's School History of England (maps and illustrations, 90 cents); Walker's Our Birds and their Nestlings (illustrated, 60 cents); Ames' Text-Book of General Physics (768 pp., illustrated, $3.50); and Spicker's Greek Prose Composition (276 pp., $1.30).

Boys of the Street, and How to Win Them, by Charles Stelzle. The author is a lover of boys and does not forget that he was once one himself. In a sympathetic, kindly way, with no cant, he tells how boys may be won from the street. Mr. Stelzle has had exceptional experience among boys, and his suggestions are practical. His idea seems to be that if a boy is given something to do in which he is interested, provide him with a place where he can be instructed and amused and he will no longer be a street "tough." Clubs and classes are recommended, as boys are social creatures. "Save the boys and you anchor the man." Price 50c. Published by Fleming H. Revell Co., New York.

Manassas, a Novel of the War, by Upton Sinclair. A story of the Civil War, tragic and bloody. The pen of a Harriet Beecher Stowe might have written the awful tale of the runaway slave and his dreadful death. The author gives a vivid word picture of the battle of Bull Run, and his realism in describing the horrors of war, the savage butcher into which it turns every man engaged in the fight, certainly must incline the reader to hope that the dove of peace may soon alight and build her nest. Aside from the battle-scenes there is much historical and interesting information as to what led up to the rupture between the North and South, and the consequent bloodshed between brothers of one nation. Price $1.50. Published by the Macmillan Company, New York.

The Phoenix and the Carpet, by F. Nesbitt, illustrated by H. R. Millar. A fascinating story, written by one who loves and understands children. The tale of how the beautiful golden bird came to be hatched in the children's nursery, and the wonderful powers of the wishing carpet, which covered the floor, carries one back to the time when Alice in Wonderland was the book of all others to the youthful reader. The story is so well told and the children are such hearty real ones that the repetition of such phrases as "you know jolly well," "being beastly bored," "how ripping," and being "hoarse with gassing" but slightly mar the exquisite stories of the wonderful adventures of these fortunate children—who are very human indeed—and their lovely companion, the golden phoenix. Pp. 257. Price $1.50. Macmillan Company, New York.

Paths of Judgment, by Anne Douglas Sedgwick. This is an interest-holding tale, and once begun, the reader will scarcely lay it down until the last chapter is finished. There are four rather vivid personalities—two women and two men. Of this quartette, one man and one woman, seem to have considerable difficulty in determining who they are in love with. One of the men makes love to both of the women, and one of the women does not know which of the two men she really loves. Of course she marries the wrong man, who is loved by the other woman, a selfish, unprincipled creature who makes trouble by telling things. In the tangle that follows, one wishes that some of the other characters, notably the husband and wife, were as sure of their own feelings as this rather venomous woman. A pistol shot clears up things at the end of the story, leaving the reader rather inclined to sympathize with the wrong person. Price $1.50. Published by The Century Co., New York.

Golden Weddings

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. W. Smith, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., celebrated their golden wedding on April 20.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Schaeble, of Brooklyn, who have been life-long subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, passed the golden milestone of their wedding on May 4. Owing to the recent severe illness of Mrs. Schaeble, the event was celebrated very quietly. They were the recipients of several very beautiful gifts.

At their pleasant home near Lathrop, Calif., Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Wolfe recently celebrated their golden wedding. The rooms were artistically decorated with golden flowers, and beautiful gifts attested the love and esteem of their children. Jacob Wolfe was married to Miss Frances Lane, April 6, 1854, near Carthage, Ill. Soon after their marriage they came to California, where they have since resided.

Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Sterner, of Saucona, Pa., were given a very pleasant surprise on June 4, the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage. While absent from home on a short visit, by previous arrangement, children and grandchildren gathered at the old homestead and trimmed the spacious rooms with flowers and other decorations. At the return of the bride and groom of half a century ago, they were heartily welcomed with loving congratulations. Mrs. Sterner is sixty-nine years of age and her husband ten years her senior. Three of their seven children are still living, also sixteen grandchildren.

A Famous Traveler Dead

ONE of the most remarkable women of our time passed away, when Isabella Bird Bishop died on October 7. She had visited many strange peoples, and her ready pen had given us bright descriptions of their homes and their lives. Full of energy and an atiable love of travel, she had been stricken by a disease that would have killed an ordinary woman at home, an invalid for life. It was strange that a woman afflicted with a painful spinal curvatures should have had the energy for travel and the indomitable spirit that kept her in continual movement, and sustained her amid circumstances of danger and fatigue. Yet she lived to be seventy-two years of age, and in the later years of her adventurous life her vigor was unabated, and she accomplished the feat which would have taxed the powers of any other woman, of riding a thousand miles through the wildest regions of Morocco. Her long life of adventure is a story; her pen, which has written so much and enchanted so many, is laid to rest forever.

She was the daughter of an English clergyman. Her love of exploration developed in early life. In 1852, when she was only twenty years of age, she undertook a journey through the Rocky Mountains, and made her first acquaintance with the reading public by her bright, breezy book, The Englishwoman in America. At various times she journeyed to the Sandwich Islands, to the interior of Japan, which she thoroughly explored; to Siberia, China, Persia, Korea, and Kurdistan. Only on two occasions did she have the protection of an escort. Her intrepid spirit knew no fear. With one native servant, she pushed through obstacles from which men shrink, and in the direst peril her coolness and presence of mind availed to save her life. In Western China only was she seriously injured. There stones were thrown at her by mobs, one of which caused concussion of the brain, and another broke one of her arms. In Kurdistan she was robbed of all she had with her, but the robbers allowed her to proceed. In 1881 she became the wife of Dr. John Bishop, but her married happiness was of short duration. In 1886 she lost her husband, and she promptly resumed her travels, as a diversion to her sorrow. As a means of facilitating her passage through uncivilized lands, she studied medicine and surgery. There were occasions when her skill in both stood her in good stead, and gained her the goodwill of the people. She was horrified by the torture the people endured through the superstitions of the native doctors. Wherever it was possible she gave permanent relief. In no less than five instances she succeeded in raising funds for the erection of hospitals, in which enlightened methods of treatment were practiced, and in another instance she built an orphanage for the care of neglected children.

It is gratifying to learn that her visits to mission stations, where she went unheralded, and saw the work being done under circumstances enabling her to form an unprejudiced opinion, made her an enthusiastic advocate of missionary labor. She believed implicitly in the Gospel as the panacea for the miseries of heathenism, and was untiring and unstinted in her praise of the missionary's self-denial and devoted service. In the great Ecumenical Missionary Council in New York in 1900, she bore witness to what she had seen, and told her hearers how earnest and self-sacrificing was the work the missionaries were doing. Of the results of their labors she had the highest opinion, and never wavered in her conviction that eventually the whole world would be brought to acknowledge the supremacy of Christ. Her plea for the millions of women in heathen lands, on whom the horrors of heathenism lie most heavily, will never be forgotten by any one who listened to its intense pathos. She had seen them in the harems and in the zenanas, had lived with them and witnessed the miseries they had to endure; she had seen their degradation and begged her sisters to carry to them the good news of the Gospel.

"I have been a storm or peril-bound guest," she said, "in more than fifty women's houses, including the women's tents of the large nomadic population of Persia. I have seen much of the inmates and have had unveiled for me the mysteries of their secluded lives. They know nothing. They have no ideals. Dress and personal adornment are their sole interests. They are regarded as possessing neither soul nor immortality. With dwarfed and childish intellect, is combined a precocity on a gigantic scale in the evil passions of adults—hatred, envy, jealousy, sensuality, greed and malignity. We know what Christianity has done for us. We know, and that only in part, what Islam and heathenism have done for our sisters. May God give us sympathetic hearts by which alone we may realize their need."

Deaf People Now Hear Whispers

Wireless Telephones Invented by a Kentuckian.

Invisible, When Worn, but Act Like Eye-Glasses.

Another Marconi heard from. He makes the Deaf distinctly. He has invented little wireless telephones, so soft in the ears one can't tell they are wearing them. And, no one else can tell either, because they are out of sight when worn. Wilson's Ear Drums are to weak hearing what spectacles are to weak sight. Because, they are sound-magnifiers, just as glasses are sight-magnifiers.

They rest the Ear Nerves by taking the strain off them—the strain of trying to hear dim sounds. They can be put into the ears, or taken out, in a minute, just as comfortably as spectacles can be put on and off.

And, they can be worn for weeks at a time, because they are ventilated, and so soft in the ear holes they are not felt even when the head rests on the pillow. They also protect any raw inner parts of the ear from wind, or cold, dust, or sudden and piercing sounds.

These little telephones make it as easy for a Deaf person to hear weak sounds as spectacles make it easy to read fine print. And, the longer one wears them the better his hearing grows, because they rest up, and strengthen, the ear nerves. To rest a weak ear from straining is like resting a strained wrist from working.

Wilson's Ear Drums rest the Ear Nerves by making the sounds louder, so it is easy to understand without trying and straining. They make Deaf people cheerful and comfortable, because such people can talk with their friends without the friends having to shout back at them. They can hear without straining. It is the straining that puts such a queer, anxious look on the face of a deaf person.

Wilson's Ear Drums make all the sound strike hard on the center of the human ear drum, instead of spreading it weakly all over the surface. It thus makes the center of the human ear drum vibrate ten times as much as if the same sound struck the whole drum head. It is this vibration of the ear drum that carries sound to the hearing Nerves. When we make the drum vibrate ten times as much we make the sound ten times as loud and ten times as easy to understand.

This is why people who had not in years heard a clock strike can now hear that same clock tick anywhere in the room, while wearing Wilson's Ear Drums.

Deafness, from any cause, ear-ache, buzzing noises in the head, raw and running ears, broken ear-drums, and other ear troubles, are relieved and overcome (even after Ear Doctors have given up the cases), by the use of these comfortable little ear-resters and sound-magnifiers.

A sensible book, about Deafness, tells how they are made, and has printed in it letters from hundreds of people who are using them.

Clergymen, Lawyers, Physicians, Telegraph Operators, Trainmen, Workers in Boiler Shops and Foundries—four hundred people of all ranks who were Deaf, tell their experience in this free book. They tell how their hearing was brought back to them almost instantly, by the proper use of Wilson's Ear Drums.

Some of these very people may live near you, and be well known to you. What they have to say is mighty strong proof.

This book has been the means of making 326,000 Deaf people hear again. It will be mailed free to you if you merely write a post card for it to-day. Don't put off getting back your hearing. Write now, while you think of it. Get the free book of proof.

National Sin

By MRS. M. BAXTER

HOW many there are who are saints indeed until they are in prosperity! It is a much easier thing to trust God in days of adversity, when no other help is near, than to have a single eye to him when we are carrying all before us. The only safety for children of God who are in prosperity is to maintain a deeper and more constant communion with God; a more invariable spirit of adoration and thanksgiving than in the days of poverty. Fullness does not harm a man who is self empty, and who sees all he has as being the real property of another. When Uz-ziah was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction (II. Chron. 26:16). He took upon him the priestly office which did not belong to him, and went into the temple to burn incense upon the golden altar before the veil. It was sacrilege: and the priests rightly opposed him, and called upon him to go out of the sanctuary. The king was wroth with the priests; his pride was hurt; and while the censer was still in his hand, God smote him; the leprosy broke out upon his forehead, and the king departed to dwell alone: a leper and unclean.

It was at this time that Isaiah, who was a seer, began, as God opened his eyes, to see things from his standpoint, how his people looked in the eyes of a holy God. They neither knew themselves nor their God aright; and in the overwhelming spectacle of the state of Judah and Jerusalem, as God saw it, the prophet cries: "Hear, O Heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken. I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me. The ox knoweth its owner, and the ass his master's crib; but Israel doth not know: My people doth not consider." Well, reader, you have seen your own or your neighbor's horse turn instinctively to the familiar stable: do you turn as instinctively, day by day, to your Master and your God?

In II. Kings 17:19 grievous charges are brought against Israel: of departure from God, from his Word and law, of following the nations, of idolatry, in all its forms, and of the abominations which are its accompaniment, at the time of the third captivity. And these indictments are followed by the words: "Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight: there was none left but the tribe of Judah only. Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel, which they had made.

This captivity of Israel took place during the time of Isaiah's prophecy, and he calls Judah and Jerusalem, in the Word of the Lord, a "sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil-doers; children that are corrupters." And what is at the root of it all? "They have forsaken Jehovah, they have provoked the Holy One of Israel into anger, they are gone backward." Let us pause and consider how far this terrible description fits us. A people laden with iniquity is a people which does not humble herself nationally for her national sins. Every national sin which is not nationally repented of becomes like a further load of national debt towards God, which has to be reckoned for sooner or later. It is so with everyone of us individually. "Keep short accounts with God," was D. L. Moody's advice. Isaiah saw Judah in such a condition that it resembled a human body diseased in every part: "From the sole of the foot even to the head there is no soundness in it; but wounds and bruises and putrefying sores" (v. 6).

Isaiah knew the heart of his God, and asks a pertinent question: "Why should ye be stricken any more?" He sees trouble coming (verses 7-9), but knows that God waits only for his people to repent (Joel 2:15-20). Thus he makes a solemn, stirring appeal to do away with unreal worship. "To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? saith the Lord." Can we answer the question? Is God enriched, or even honored, by a repetition of many words, whether in liturgical services or in meetings for edification?

SIZE DOESN'T COUNT IF YOU KNOW JIU-JITSU

The Japanese National System of Physical Training and Self-Defense

JIU-JITSU is a system of exercise that develops strength and endurance. The Japanese, though small of stature, possess almost superhuman strength. In the allied nations through China in 1900, they repeatedly out-marched the soldiers of every other nation. They attributed their strength and powers of endurance to the persistent practice of JIU-JITSU. Every soldier of the Mikado, skilled in the art. JIU-JITSU embodies the ideal principles of attainable perfect health and perfect physical development. It is the evolution of twenty-five centuries of constant practice and improvement. It is a system of physical training and self-defense which surpasses all other. Its basis is strategy and skill. As a means of self-defense, the man woman versed in JIU-JITSU can protect themselves against persons twice their size and strength.

Jiu-Jitsu Successfully Taught by Mail

For over 2,000 years the principles of Jiu-Jitsu have been religiously guarded. By an Imperial edict the teaching of the system was forbidden outside of Japan. The friendly feeling, however, existing between Japan and the United States has been instrumental in releasing Jiu-Jitsu from its out-bound secrecy, and all secrets of the Japanese National System of Physical Culture and Self-Defense now being revealed to the American people for the first time by the YABE SCHOOL OF JIU-JITSU, at Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Y. K. Yabe, formerly of the Tenshin School of Jiu-Jitsu, has formulated a correspondence course which contains full instruction in Jiu-Jitsu. It is identical with the course taught in the lead school of Japan.

FIRST LESSON SENT FREE

An intensely interesting book which explains the principles of Jiu-Jitsu has been written by Mr. Yabe. As long as the edition lasts, this book, together with the first lesson in the art, will be sent free to interested persons. The lesson will be illustrated with full-page half-tone engravings, and shows one of the most effective methods known to Jiu-Jitsu for disposing of a dangerous antagonist. If you desire to learn more about the closely-guarded secrets of this marvelous science, should write to-day for this free book and specimen lesson. They will be sent by return mail, postpaid. A Whole Year for 10 Cents

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, of St. Louis, is now the greatest Magazine in the world, having One Million Five Hundred Thousand (1,500,000) subscribers, almost double the number of subscribers any other magazine or newspaper in the world has. Each issue is filled with splendid stories, beautiful engravings, special departments of Floriculture, Fancy-work, Fashions, Household, Health and Beauty, Poultry, Garden, etc.

There is a reason why THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE has more than double the number of subscribers that any other publication in the world has: if a reader of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE wishes to know anything about the latest styles, THAT month's issue gives them; if some bug is destroying her plants, THAT month's issue tells her what it is and how to get rid of it; if fruits are to be preserved, THAT month's issue tells all about them. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always tells its readers what they want to know at the right time. From 96 to 138 columns each issue of splendid pictures, interesting stories, useful information: Flowers, the Garden, Lace Making, Embroidery (with new and beautiful patterns each month that any woman can make), Cooking Recipes, Fashions, Poultry, etc., Household Decoration, Pyrography, Curious Facts, Health and Beauty columns; each issue supplies reading for the whole family.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE never permits misleading advertisements to appear in its columns and absolutely protects its readers so that they are not defrauded by catch-penny schemes. No whiskey or nasty medical ads. are ever seen in the columns of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. It is clean, wholesome and bright. A single issue is worth more than the whole year's subscription. We wish every home in America to receive THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and in order that it may go into your home, we will send you THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE and if you do not like it after you have received it for three months, we will turn your 10 cents and stop sending it. You will have had it three months for nothing. This shows very plainly that we know you will be pleased with THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE. You will never be willing to discontinue it. In fact, we know you will be so delighted you will also get your friends to subscribe. No other magazine gives as much for five times the price we ask you.

Do not confuse THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE of St. Louis with the cheap, poorly printed and trashy story papers. THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE is printed on fine paper, carefully edited and beautifully illustrated and is better than most Magazines sold for ten times the price at which we offer it to you. Our offer to refund your money if you do not like it after three months' trial is a guarantee that no other magazine ever dared to make.

Tens of thousands of women visited our great building this year. It is the most beautiful building in this country and the finest publishing plant in the world, and was built for cash at a cost of over half a million dollars, exclusively for the publication of Tens of Thousands of Our Readers Visited Our Great Building This Year.

THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE

During the World's Fair, tens of thousands of our readers were taken care of by THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE, in the great tent city "Camp Lewis," erected for our readers at a cost of over $30,000. The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE know that every month they can expect some new and interesting feature.

The readers of THE WOMAN'S MAGAZINE always know how to do things; their gardens and houses are the wonder of their neighbors, because it contains plain, easily understood articles, telling more good things about Flowers and the Garden than regular Floral Papers and are always seasonable. More good things about Fancy Work and Embroidery, than illustrated patterns, than Fashion Papers. More good things about Poultry and the Garden, and how to make money with them, than Poultry Papers. More good things about the Kitchen and Household than Household Papers.

ALWAYS SEASONABLE. ALWAYS CORRECT. ALWAYS EASILY UNDERSTOOD

This is the greatest opportunity you will ever get to secure one of the finest monthly magazines published, for a whole year for 10 cents, the price usually charged for a single copy of such a paper. Do not delay, but send 10 cents for a year's subscription, stating that you are a reader of The Christian Herald. NOTICE:-If you wish to take advantage of this opportunity for your friends, you can send 10c. each for as many subscriptions as you wish. You could not make a nicer present to your friends than one which will remind them each month, of you, so pleasantly. Address

JAMIESON, FAUSSET & BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY (Two Vols.)

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow; Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York; and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen. A complete commentary, critical, explanatory and practical—on the Old and New Testaments, 1380 pages. Former Price, $9.00. The body of the work consists of notes that are concise, learned, free from verbiage and easily understood, that elucidate and explain difficult passages of Scripture, or whose import is not readily apprehended. Far in advance of the older works now in use, it is also the most practical, suggestive and scientific.

Rev. J. H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "It deserves a place on the table of every Bible student."

CRITICAL AND EXPOSITORY BIBLE CYCLOPAEDIA

By Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., joint author of the Jamieson, Fausset & Brown Bible Commentary. 750 three-column pages; 600 illustrations. Regular Price, $5.00.

This great work is the result of seven years of labor by the author, contains three thousand seven hundred articles and presents a completeness, conciseness and thoroughness such as to make it a perfect Bible Cyclopaedia. It sets forth briefly and suggestively those doctrinal and experimental truths which are contained in the Written Word itself.

The late Rev. Dr. T. De Witt Talmage: "It is in advance of all books in that line—unique, learned, accurate and valuable."

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

The celebrated Jewish Historian, translated from the Original Greek by William Whiston, A.M. 1,056 pages, nearly 100 illustrations. Former Price, $4.00.

In this great work is contained the History and Antiquities of the Jews, Destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; also Dissertations concerning Jesus Christ, John the Baptist, James the Just, and the Sacrifice of Isaac.

ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF THE BIBLE

By Rev. John Kitto, D.D., F.S.A. It contains 735 double-column pages, 220 engravings. Former Price, $4.50.

No modern writer has contributed more largely to enrich the biblical literature of our time, or to clothe with a fresh and living interest the main personages and incidents in Bible History than John Kitto in this magnificent work. Deeply interesting and instructive, and abounding in striking pictorial illustrations, it should have a place in every home. Over 100,000 copies of this popular work have been sold.

EDERSHEIM'S LIFE AND TIMES OF JESUS THE MESSIAH

(2 Vols.) The Authorized American Edition. By Alfred Edersheim, M.A., Oxon., D.D., Lecturer Oxford University. Former Price, $6.00. Royal 8vo. 1,524 pages, handsomely bound in silk cloth. Gives a full account of the society, life and development—intellectual and religious—in Palestine, to serve as a frame and background for the picture of Christ. The fresh study of the text of the Gospels makes the book a historical commentary on the Gospels.

The Sunday School Times recommends it: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Saviour which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time."

CONCISE CYCLOPAEDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE

Biblical, Biographical, Theological, Historical, Geographical and Practical. By Rev. E. B. Sanford, D.D., assisted by a brilliant galaxy of Biblical Scholars and Divines. 985 pages, beautifully illustrated. Regular Price, $3.50.

To the seekers after knowledge this work will prove a surprising storehouse of information regarding Church History, Bible History, Bible Names, Places, Customs, Doctrines, Creeds, Denominations, the Early Church, the Story of the Reformation, the various Young People's Societies, Theologians, Scholars, Cathedrals, Churches, etc.

SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

Edited by William Smith, LL.D., Classical Examiner of University of London. It formerly sold for $4.50.

Contains 1,024 large octavo pages finely illustrated. An indispensable aid to ministers, teachers, families, Sunday School Superintendents and Bible readers generally. This is, undoubtedly, the best work of its kind in the English language.

THE LIFE AND EPISTLES OF ST. PAUL

By the Rev. W. J. Coneybeare, M.A., of Cambridge, and J. S. Howson, D.D., of Liverpool. Formerly sold for $4.50.

Contains 1,014 large octavo pages, many fine illustrations, maps, charts, etc. There is no work that will compare with this in giving a life-like picture of the great apostle and the work which he did.

CRUDEN'S COMPLETE CONCORDANCE

By Alexander Cruden, M.A. Former Price, $1.50.

Contains 756 large octavo pages, clearly printed and handsomely and strongly bound in cloth. Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture, and next to the Bible no volume is of greater value to the Bible student than Cruden's Concordance.

THREE THOUSAND SELECTED QUOTATIONS

By Josiah Gilbert. Introduction by Chas. S. Robinson, D.D. 681 pages. Former Price, $2.00. Burning words of brilliant writers from the literature of all ages, with complete index of authors and subjects. Undenominational and evangelical. Preachers, Teachers and Bible students will be charmed with these bright utterances, which clearly and forcibly express or apply some religious truth.

Take Notice! We will take back any or all books that are not satisfactory in ten days after examination, and will return money, deducting only the return freight or express charges. This marvelous offer is limited, and money will be returned if the books are exhausted and we cannot fill your order. As to our responsibility, we refer to any commercial agency. Established 1866. Moravian Heroism in the Arctic Readers of this journal will recall previous letters published in these pages concerning the remarkable missionary work conducted by the Moravian Church in Labrador. In the following letter from Pastor Christian Schmitt, the missionary in charge of the Moravian Settlement at Nain, an interesting picture is presented of the beginnings and progress of religious work in that far-off land. The photographs were sent by Pastor Schmitt expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

YOU will have wondered, no doubt, why your kind letter of February 26 was not answered before. Our coast is icebound until the end of June, and only after the middle of July is it possible for any letters to reach us. Your letter and check of $20 were indeed very welcome. The latter will go toward reducing our present mission deficiency. We should be very pleased if friends on your side took a lively interest in our work.

Our Labrador Mission was founded in 1771. The Eskimos at that time were savages and heathen, and the first missionary, Jannes Erhardt, was murdered on an island which he visited in order to preach the Gospel. This happened in the year 1722, and some years afterward others volunteered to take Mr. Erhardt's place, and the first mission station, Nain, was founded. Since then the mission has spread north and south, so that at present we have seven fully established mission stations here, with a staff of sixteen missionaries, and through their agency every Eskimo on the Labrador coast has been brought under Gospel influences.

One may ask, What induced the Moravian brotherhood to start missions among the poorest of mankind, in these out-of-the-way Arctic regions? Count Zenzendorf was the instrument destined in God's hand to re-establish and mould the Moravian Church. The poorest and most despised nations were thought of first, and these simple but zealous Moravians were willing to undergo any hardships in order to reach the heathen and bring to them the Gospel of Christ, the friend of all the needy. From Saxony, their home, they worked their way to the coast, in the hope that they might find a ship and a captain who would engage them as common sailors, so as to enable them to cross the ocean. By these means, quite a number of these undaunted Moravians reached make use of existing facilities. In after years they were enabled to buy and send out their own mission ships. Labrador needed, above all, a mission vessel, as no ship navigated this lonely, unknown, and, for the most part of the year, icebound coast. The mission ship Harmony has plied these waters now annually for many years. To some of our Eskimos, it is the only vessel they have ever seen. God has most graciously protected our ship from any serious harm for over fifty years.

Our Eskimo of the present day is much more civilized than his forefathers were a hundred years ago. He still retains the same way of securing a livelihood, namely, by hunting and fishing. The polar bear, the walrus, various kinds of seals, reindeer, black bears, wolves, foxes, etc., are secured, and much skill and judgment is exercised by hunters in killing the larger game. It is an incessant and hard life-struggle with the oftentimes severe forces of the elements of wind, ice, snow and waves. Many a brave hunter, far out at sea in his frail kayak, harpoon in hand, while hunting the walrus or seal, has found an untimely and watery grave.

The Gospel of Christ and Him crucified has brought to many of these simple homes comfort and happiness, in time of severe trial and bereavement. All the Eskimos in our care can read and write. The whole Bible, printed and published almost free of charge by the noble British and Foreign Bible Society, is greatly valued and continually in use among them. As our Eskimos have no literature of their own, we have a small press here, which has done good work. Our Labrador newspaper, probably the smallest of its kind, is published monthly, from January till June. Any friends wishing to know more of our work here and elsewhere, can do so on writing to Paul De Schweinitz, Bethlehem, Pa. (Rev.) CHR. SCHMITT. Nain, Labrador.

the West Indies in 1731, Greenland in 1733, and also Labrador. They were willing even to become slaves for Christ's sake, in order that they might be a blessing to that poor and degraded class of people.

God's blessing was on their work, and soon friends and means were forthcoming, which enabled them to

Nominal Christians

TEXT—Matt. 25 : 8
"Give us of your oil ; for our lamps are gone out"

ALL men may be broadly divided into two classes. There are some on the border line, belonging not altogether to the one class or the other, having characteristics of each, but the great mass may be separated into two groups—the workers and the idlers. The one class includes the toilers, the pullers, the diggers, the grinders, the climbers. They are striving to succeed in a noble, honest way. They do not mean to be social parasites.

They want a share of the good things of life, but they do not expect to receive them as a gift, but to pay for them by honest work. They hope for promotion, and they strive to merit it by seeking to make themselves worthy of it. They study and toil, to develop themselves, so that when the opportunity comes they will be ready to take advantage of it. Though they may be in obscure positions they do their work well, and when the call comes to go higher, they are prepared by long years of hard work to perform the duties of the higher position.

"Why do you study so hard?" a Yale classmate asked one day of John C. Calhoun, the South Carolina student, who was his roommate. "You are now the leading student in the College. No man can successfully compete with you in any study." "Oh," answered the young man, "I am not working for leadership in a college town. I am working to be a leader in the nation." "What, Calhoun—do you expect to be a great statesman in Washington?" "If I did not expect to go to Congress within six years," answered Calhoun, "I would pack up my books at once, and leave Yale tomorrow. I feel so sure of going to Congress that I begrudge every wasted minute. I must prepare myself by unceasing labor to meet the nation's leaders in the arena of debate." John C. Calhoun, wanted to win success. He did more than that. He wanted to prepare himself by hard work for the time when that success should come, as come it did, and as it nearly always will come, to those who are conscientious in preparatory work.

Drones in the Church

The second class is comprised of men who want to win success by a minimum of labor. They hate drudgery; they hope to succeed by some lucky scheme. These are the men who, going on a foreign tour, expect to learn French or German in five weeks; they hope to marry a rich wife and have an easy time living on the savings of their wife's father; they prepare to conduct the business of their fathers, not by beginning, as he did, at the lowest rung of the ladder, but by taking a six months' course in a business college, or by becoming their father's nominal private secretaries. During their easy apprenticeship they would spend three days out of every week playing golf and at least five nights out of every seven in ball-room, at theatre party, or in club-house dissipation. The little time they play at business is when they are not working at play. These people represent failure. For as an old writer once said: "People who never do any more work than they are paid for, never get paid for any more than they do." These people always want to succeed with a minimum of work.

Yes, the two kinds of people on earth I mean,
Are the people who lift and the people who lean,
Wherever you go you will find the world's masses
Are always divided in just these two classes;
And oddly enough, you will find too, I ween,
There is only one lifter to twenty who lean.

Drones there are in the busy beehives of temporal life. Drones there are in the busy beehives of spiritual life. We know them well. They have existed in every age. Men who hope to enter heaven, but are not willing to deny themselves, nor to resist temptation, nor to strive to enter through the strait gate. It was to warn people of the futility of such lives that Christ spoke the parable of the ten virgins. Five of them, he said, were foolish, self-indulgent, and heedless of the obligations of the spiritual life. He is not here denouncing criminals or vicious people. These virgins were nominally Christians, not the murderers and robbers who infested the lonely roads of Palestine, ready to waylay the traveler; not the openly immoral, like the Magdalene or the woman of Samaria; but the people who, as an old commentator has said, make a "profession of the Gospel and act in such a manner as to give real Christians a favorable impression of them and so gain admittance into their midst." He is alluding to Christians in name only, who outwardly appear all right, and yet have not the true inward consecration of heart, and who expect, therefore, to go to heaven upon borrowed spiritual capital.

These spiritual mendicants of my text are, in the first place, the men and women indifferent to the commandments of Jesus Christ, who expect to ultimately reach heaven on account of the consecration of a Christian ancestry. They are not bad men, as the world looks upon bad men. They have been rocked in Christian cradles. They have been reared in Christian nurseries and Christian Sunday Schools. During their boyhood days, they have knelt at Christian altars and sat in Christian pews. But as far as their own lives have been concerned, they have had no Christian experience, and have never openly confessed Jesus Christ as their Saviour. They have never done anything to show their devotion to God as consecrated disciples of Christ. And yet, if you should ask these men to-day if they expected to reach heaven, they would instantly answer, "Of course, of course, of course! The home of my youth was a Christian home. I am a child of the covenant. My father was a good Christian man. My mother prayed over me from the time I was born, until she died. Why should I not go where they are?"

Expectant Heirs

Oh, yes, my friend, you would certainly go to heaven upon the borrowed capital of your father's and mother's lifelong consecration, if they had any power to take you there. But the difficulty is that your father's and mother's spiritual power is limited. From the time you were born, your parents lived entirely for you and your brothers and sisters. Every pleasure and every indulgence they had, they shared with you. If they were given, or ever bought a box of candy, they never ate it alone. They always brought it home and divided it with their children. When your father, by a judicious investment, made an extra amount of money, he at once said to your mother, "Now, mother, let us go off to the seashore with the children, and have some fun together. We all have needed the change for a long time." They did not leave the children at home. They took them all along when they could. They divided their luxuries with you. They divided their pleasures with you. They divided with you their necessities. You were out riding one cold night. You did not bring along your overcoat, as your mother told you to do. She did not then say, "Now, Harry, just shiver and be cold. Now learn a lesson, that you must take your heavy coat the next time you go out." Oh, no. That was not mother's way. She said: "Come close to me, my boy; I can wrap my shawl about your shoulders. You can draw part of my dress over your little legs." Mother always gave us children half, aye, three-fourths of all she had. She was willing to divide with us everything she could.

But there is one blessing your mother and father have that they cannot divide with their children. They cannot divide with you their oil of spiritual life. They could lead you to the Rock of Calvary, where, in the blood of Jesus, you might see how your sins might be cleansed; but you must yourself seek an interest in his atonement. They could tell you of the Holy Spirit, whose illumination could scatter your spiritual darkness; but the oil of His divine influence you must implore for yourself. They could compel you, as a child, to go and sit in the church pew; but they could not compel you to receive Christ as your Saviour. That is a matter simply between you and Jesus. They could introduce Christ to you as their very best Friend. But they could not force you to make their Friend, Jesus, your friend. He will never become a part of your life unless you yourself open to him the Holy of Holies of your heart to let him in. Neither will Christ receive you as one of his own, unless you truly come to him with the countersign of the cross.

A Vain Hope

And yet, many people expect ultimately to reach heaven on account of the borrowed spiritual oil of a consecrated Christian ancestry. "Oh," said a minister's daughter to me some time ago, "I know I am not living as I ought; but I am all right. I have no fear about the future. I have made my husband promise to bury me at the foot of my father's grave. When the archangel's trumpet sounds, and we all come up, I am going to cling to my father's hand. I know Christ will let me in if I am by his side. I know it, because my father was such a good man. I know Christ would not refuse my father anything." She said this half in jest and half in earnest. Many of us have the same hope and say the same things, not half in jest, but in dead earnest. No, my friends, when the Bridegroom cometh on that great day of the resurrection, your father and mother will have no spiritual oil to spare. Then we cannot follow the Divine Bridegroom with our parcels of spiritual light. We must have our own lighted oil to become part of the wedding procession of the redeemed, or forever stay out of Christ's banquet hall, enveloped by the impenetrable and crushing darkness of eternal night.

Church-Membership as a Fetish

These five foolish virgins represent another class. They represent the nominal church members. They represent the men and women who look upon church membership as a kind of fetish. We read that during the Dark Ages the Catholic devotees used to buy "Plenary Indulgences," which would absolve them of their future sins, which they were about to commit intentionally. So, some people, who are nominal church members, seem to think that they can lie and steal and cheat and commit all the forbidden sins of the Decalogue, if they are only church members in good standing. They seem to think that the crucial essential of Christianity is a perfection of creed for the head, and not absolute consecration for the heart. They seem to think that they can walk hand in hand with sin, and continue to so walk, if they can only repeat this sentence as they go: "I believe in Jesus. I believe in Jesus. Yes, I believe in Jesus!" Now, Christ, by the parable of my text, says that a mere mental faith in him, unaccompanied by a surrender of the heart to him, is not faith at all. The faith that saves, is a faith that transforms the life—a faith that takes complete control of a man. The nominal church members do not have consecration of heart and pure life, as well as a perfect Gospel creed. I believe that Christ's future teachings affirm that he is more willing to forgive the sins of an out-and-out enemy, who once blasphemed him, but repents of his sin, than he is willing to forgive a Judas, who never denied him publicly, but who in private life betrays him with a kiss.

Backsliders Forgiven

How about Peter? Did not Christ gladly forgive him his three denials, when Peter repented after the cock crowed? The most powerful pulpit description of any Bible scene I ever read or heard, was that delivered by Joseph Parker of "Peter's Three Denials." In the first place, the great preacher described the scene of Judas, hypocritical Judas, stealthily approaching Christ, and planting a betraying kiss upon the Saviour's cheek. Then came the tramp of the Roman soldiers. Then the lines were formed, as the prisoner is being marched back to the capital. In olden times, as now, when a man is arrested, the crowds of curiosity seekers were augmented step by step. Peter, when he saw the multitude, became very much frightened. Instead of walking side by side with Christ, as he ought to have done, he followed afar off. When they approached the home of Caiaphas, the high priest, Peter came to the house, and sat down by a fire, and began to warm himself, as though he had never been with Christ or seen Christ in his life. While he sat there by the fire, a young Jewish maiden came up and eyed him sharply. Then she tapped him upon the shoulder, and said: "Are you not a friend of Jesus? Thou, also, wilt with Jesus of Nazareth." But Peter merely shrugged his shoulders as he answered: "I know not what thou sayest." Peter then gets up and leaves the room, and goes out upon the porch. When he has gone, another Jewish maiden touches him upon the shoulder, and says: "This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth." Then old Joseph Parker shook his leonine head and let out a growl, as he said, "I do not know the man." When the people began to crowd about him, Peter still more vehemently began to protest his ignorance with oaths and curses. He denied him in the meekest, the most contemptible and cowardly way. Yet when Peter repented of his sin, Christ forgave him, and restored him to his apostleship. Christ is magnanimous. He will save the worst sinner, if he comes to him in sincere penitence, grieving for his sins and treating pardon; but for the man who confesses himself with his lips, but denies him by his life, he has no word but, "Woe, woe unto you hypocrites."

The Empty Creed

Not unto every one that calleth, "Lord, Lord, open unto us," shall the banquet hall of Christ be opened. Not unto the nominal church members shall the invitation be given to come and sup with the divine Bridegroom. What became of these five foolish virgins who had no oil for their lamps? All the ten virgins had the same kind of lamps. The creed of man can aptly be symbolized in the lamp which holds the oil.

Gospel Progress in South Africa

GOD is continuing to bless our work here.

About three years ago we had no native work, and no church was doing anything here for the heathen. The Rev. M. W. Ehnes, who had been bravely holding the fort (although prostrated several times with fever), and myself knelt on the spot where our church now is, and commended the work to God. Ever since that time, he has given the work rich blessing. Hardly a service is held without having conversions.

It is wonderful what a transformation has taken place among the natives, changing the very expression of their faces and causing an improvement in their general appearance, since they have given up their red blanket and washed the red ochre from their bodies.

Great difficulty is experienced in dealing with the native women. The men do not wish them to go to the church, and, in fact, the chiefs in most kraals will not permit the women to come out and hear the Gospel, so that it is hard to get hold of the women.

The women in the photograph enclosed were a short time ago in heathenism. Now the Gospel has entered into their hearts and the change is indeed marvelous. We find among them splendid Christians. One woman walks five miles every Sunday to be at the church. She is praying for her husband, who is still a heathen, and I believe God will soon answer her prayer.

Some of these native Christians would put many church members to shame in Christian America. Our women are true, and they carry the light with them to the various kraals.

God has given us over two hundred conversions, and nearly all of them had never heard about Jesus, the Saviour of the world, before. What a luxury it is, to tell the story to those who have never heard it!

Some of our converts are developing special gifts for Christian service. We give them ample opportunity to visit the various kraals and hold services, sending them out in bands of two or three.

Permit me to thank your readers, who have shown practical sympathy in this work. We would ask for a continuance of their prayers.

A GROUP OF NATIVE WOMEN CONVERTS AT UMTALI

They all believed in the coming of the Bridegroom. They all believed in Jesus Christ. But the oil of consecration, the purity and devotion of life were lacking. If belief in Christ would suffice, Judas himself might have been saved. The belief that has no effect on the life is not faith at all, and can never bring a man into spiritual relation with Christ. Oh, nominal church members, you must have consecration of heart as well as perfection of creed. You must have spiritual oil for your "lamps of faith," else you can never follow the Divine Bridegroom into the banquet hall of the marriage of the Lamb.

Philanthropy Vain

These spiritual mendicants of my text represent another class of spiritual beggars. They are the type of men and women who are not loafers, as we call loafers, or mere hangers-on, as we speak of hangers-on. They represent the so-called moral and upright people, who expect to go to heaven on account of the mere temporal good which they have been able to do some of their fellow-men. They represent the large class of people who expect to bribe their way into the wedding banquet, because they have given to some town a library, or endowed some college professorship, or builded some hospital, or financially helped to support some church or foreign missionary. They do not claim that they have lived for the purpose of honoring Christ and consecrating their lives to his service; but they do say, that on account of the good they have been able to do, Christ will invite them to join the wedding procession on the night that the Bridegroom cometh.

Is this true? Will Christ allow any one to join the wedding procession who comes to him merely with the "lamp of good works" in his hand? Oh, no! For, if we are honest with ourselves, we know "there is none that doeth good—no, not one." We know that many of the acts for which the world praises us, we have done with the most selfish desires and the most corrupt motives. Some of them have been done to win popular applause; some to secure the good opinion of the church and the world: for these we have received our reward, but Christ does not reward them. We know that there is not one of us who would like the thoughts of our brain and the desires of our heart to be read by the most intimate of our friends as an open book. I know some people say they are and of what they have done. John Churchill, first Duke of Marlborough, when a very old man, exultantly lived over the scenes of his sturdy manhood. Day by day his secretary used to read to him the histories of the military campaigns of which Blenheim and Ramilies and Oudenarde and Malpaquet battlefields were the successful climaxes. When a particularly brilliant move was described, on which the success of the English armies turned as upon a pivot, the old Duke's eyes would flash as he raised himself and said, "Wonderful! Wonderful! That was a masterly movement. How did I ever execute it?" He would glory in and praise his own deeds, even as aged Dean Swift would glory in the works of his youth, when he said, "What genius I must have had when I wrote that!"

But though the Duke of Marlborough gloried in the military strategy of his past life, there is not one of us, from a Gospel standpoint, who can truly glory in the "good works" we have done. Our wasted opportunities are as the sands of the sea. The good deeds we might have done, and which we have left undone, completely overshadow the little good we have been able to do. No, no. No man can light his way to the wedding banquet hall with the empty lamp of "good works." When the Bridegroom cometh, it will then be for us as dark as midnight, unless we prepare our spiritual oil in Christ's own way. "Faith without works is dead." "Work without faith," in the sight of the Divine Bridegroom, is also as black as the tomb. If we find our Gospel mendicants among those who are depending upon their mother's and father's consecration, we also find them among those who would call upon the name of Jesus Christ as a fetish and those who are depending for admission to heaven entirely upon their "good works."

Fatal Procrastination

I think, however, that the majority of spiritual beggars can be found, and always will be found among those who expect some day to consecrate their lives to Jesus Christ, but keep putting off the acceptance week by week and day by day and hour by hour, until suddenly the cry is taken up, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," and they will be called unprepared. I do not believe that all of these foolish virgins deliberately intended to be unprepared for the coming of the Bridegroom. They intended to go and get the oil which is the symbol of the spiritual life. But they kept saying to each other, "Oh, we will go tomorrow," or "We will go next week," or "We will go next month. There is plenty of time; do not worry; we will be prepared when Christ comes." So they fell into spiritual slumber, and they were called unexpectedly.

These Gospel mendicants can find their exact symbols in the financial lives of every man and woman, who live day by day and never provide for the future's rainy day. I go to you and say, "Jones, you ought to look out for your own financial interests and those of your family." You get very indignant. You answer me sharply and say, "I do not know that you have a right to give me such advice. I am looking after myself. I am paying my bills and owe no man anything." "I know it, Jones," I reply. "But you are not saving anything for the future. You are not preparing for future sickness, or old age, or even death. You are living up to every cent of your income. If you should die tomorrow, your family would not have a cent." At once your face becomes earnest. You say, "That is so. I have not a cent laid up for the future. Last week my little girl found a gray hair in my head, and it was a warning for me to prepare for old age." But you go away from me, and your new resolve is soon forgotten. A couple of years later, I read in the newspaper that you were in a railroad wreck. Your leg was crushed and had to be amputated. Or I hear from some one that you are in hard financial straits, on account of a long typhoid sickness. I go to your late home, and find that you have moved. Your house is now a very humble one. After calling a short time, I say, "Well, Jones, how are you getting along financially?" You hesitate a moment. Then you gulp down a big lump in your throat as you answer, "I have not a cent left. My doctors' bills and the loss of my position have swept away everything. Alas, I know now what you meant when you said, 'Jones, lay up for the future.' But I did not think the 'rainy day' would come so soon." That is the figure of my parable. The duty that was always being postponed was

Postponed Too Long

The oil that those foolish virgins should have had was not there when it was needed. While the Bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept. And at midnight there was a cry, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." That means, when the last call for repentance came, it came suddenly. The Bridegroom always comes suddenly. Then what happened? Why, the five foolish virgins, who in the near future expected to have the spiritual oil prepared, were found without the necessary preparation. Those that were prepared went to the wedding. The door was shut. Those who were not prepared had to stay out. The five foolish virgins became spiritual bankrupts forever. Oh, my friends, are you and I going to make the awful mistake of putting off and putting off and putting off the day necessary for the consecration of our hearts and lives for the coming of the Divine Bridegroom?

The coming of the Bridegroom may be expected at any moment. The Bible distinctly says so. When Christ comes as the Bridegroom, he will come as unexpectedly as a thief in the night, at a place and at an hour when he is least expected. Rev. Dr. Wallace, late American Consul to Jerusalem, once told me that nearly all the American Christian residents of the Davidic capital were living there in the belief, that when Christ should first appear upon earth, he would be seen standing among the Judæan Hills, and, therefore, they were there

Waiting to Welcome Him

But Christ, when he comes, will appear to us in America, as well as though we were in Europe, or Asia, or Africa. Therefore, like Robert McCheyne, I cry, "Prepare! Prepare! Prepare for the coming of the Redeemer! For the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not." Will you now prepare for the most momentous cry of the ages—"Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him"? Will you be prepared so that, at his glorious coming, he can greet you, and take you into his banquet house and lift over you the banner of love?

He is faithful that hath promised, an' he'll surely come again,

He'll keep his tryst wi' me, at what hour I dinna ken:
But he bids me still to wait, an' ready aye to be,
To gang at any moment to my ain countrie.

So I'm watching aye, and singing o' my hame as I wait;
For the soun'ing o' his footfa' this side the gowden gate,
For his bluid hath made me white, and his hand shall dry my e'e;

When he brings me hame at last to my ain countrie.

Modern Training for the Blind

IN a part of New York, which not so many years ago would have been designated as up-town, stands a large brick building, quaint and picturesque, with its many gables covered with ivy. A high brick wall encloses the structure, which is approached by a wide flagged walk. On either side is an extensive green, with here and there a large old tree standing like a sentinel on guard. This fine old building, which was built in 1831, more than half a century ago, is well worth a visit by any one inclined to think that the world is not using them just right, and that they have not their share of the blessings of this life. A ring at the entrance brings a sweet-faced lady to the door, and as there is a large window through which a visitor may look as he rings the bell, an opportunity is given to see that the lady is blind. One might not notice her infirmity at first glance, so precise and accurate are her movements; but on the outer wall there is a large graven tablet, which tells that this is the "New York Institution for the Blind." Here, year after year, come sightless little children, to be taught how to become self-supporting, useful members of society. Here, by patient, careful training, the remaining senses are developed to such an astonishing degree, that the faculty of seeing seems almost unnecessary to the gaining of an education, both in literary and manual training lines.

There are nearly 200 pupils in this institution, ranging from the little eight-year-old just commencing, to the young man and woman nearly ready to step out and take a place in the ranks of the busy workers. Who can compute the amount of constant effort, love and patience that are required of the instructors, or the hard work and pathetic endeavors of the afflicted pupils? When a blind girl or boy first starts on the educational road, it is with much faltering and timidity, and this is especially true of very young children; but once get them interested and bring them to a point of comprehension, and progress becomes rapid.

A large case filled with knitted and other handiwork—which compares favorably with any in this line of garments and useful articles made by persons who can see—fills the whole side of one of the girls' class-rooms for manual training. Here they are taught to knit, crochet, and to operate the sewing-machine. The ease with which the girls manipulate the latter is really wonderful. The writer's attention was attracted by a bright-looking girl of fourteen, who sat with a baby's sack of pink and white worsted rapidly growing under her taper fingers. As the bone hook picked up the strands, every stitch fell into its regular place, smooth and even.

"Have you always been blind, Mabel?" was asked. "No," was the quiet reply. "I could see until I was eight years old. I was coming down the street one day where some boys were snow-balling, and one hit me in the eye and destroyed it. Then, afterward, a girl ran into me when we were playing tag, and her elbow hurt my other eye so badly that I lost it also."

Never a word of complaint; never a hint of dissatisfaction; no reaching out for sympathy. She seemed to feel no need of it. When the writer remarked upon the extreme sensitiveness of her fingers, the young girl smiled and said, "Yes, I'm sure I do not know what we would do without our fingers, and things to do." This girl is as far advanced in her studies as the average child of her age in a seeing school and has also made considerable progress in music.

The first steps in the education of a blind child are in the line of manual training, for when the touch is refined and guided, the education is begun. Three strands of cord are fastened upon a hook against the wall, and the little fingers are initiated into the mysteries of a three-strand braid, then four, five, six and seven strands are given, and when these are mastered, knot-work is commenced, tying knots at points equidistant. Shopping-bags, twine-holders, and various other handy articles are made with knotted cord, and reins are braided or woven—all these by the very little ones. Various mechanical trades are taught the boys, such as chair-caning and mattress-making.

Piano-tuning seems particularly adapted to the blind hand while transcribing with the other. When it is remembered that one copy of the Bible in the type for the blind fills eleven volumes, weighing sixty-four pounds and costing $25, the advantage of this little machine seen at once, especially if a pupil should wish to copy certain chapters or passages. The American Bible Society supplies the Bible for the blind at about one-third the cost, and the Society for Providing Evangelical Religious Literature for the blind, of Philadelphia, furnishes the International S. S. Lessons free to the blind. This society was founded by Mr. H. L. Hall, superintendent of the Working Home for Blind Men in Philadelphia.

The American Printing House for the Blind, Louisville, Ky., is under the support of the U. S. Government, and its annual output is distributed free of charge among all the schools for the blind in the country. Looking through the catalogue of this publishing house, one is agreeably surprised at the list of books ranging from the alphabet sheets through an entire educational series—which seems as full and as advanced as any provided for pupils who have their eyesight. It includes standard historical and biographical works, fiction by the best authors, religious books, poetry, and music.

Mr. Wait has also invented another machine, which is of great advantage in stereotyping publications for the blind. The type, either in "New York point" or Braille, is large and comparatively clumsy, and a great deal of room is required for storage of the matter set up. Mr. Wait's "stereograph" is worked by hand and foot power.

Much attention is paid to the teaching of music in the New York Institution for the Blind, and many of the pupils become excellent musicians. For those who show a decided talent in this direction, everything possible is done to develop the gift. The sensitive ear and extremely delicate touch of the blind students are specially favorable to musical training, and some of the pupils are remarkably skilful at the organ. A large pipe-organ in the chapel gives ample opportunity for practice. Much attention is also given to vocal training. In part singing, the pupils are divided into four groups, according to the range of voices. The words are committed to memory, one verse at a time, and the different parts are rehearsed separately and then in chorus. On the day of the writer's visit, the grand old "Portuguese Hymn" was the musical theme, and when the whole school rendered the magnificent harmony the effect was wonderful.

There are over forty institutions of learning for the sightless in the United States, with an average attendance of nearly five thousand pupils. Many of the children who come to the school almost helpless, so much so as to be in some cases incapable of waiting upon themselves, leave at the expiration of a term of years (if they do not develop in some other line), fully qualified to do the work, including the cooking, of a household; and while of course it is impossible that they may successfully compete with those who can see, handicapped as they are, the blind have made marvelous strides along educational and manual lines.

THEY ARE TAUGHT TO OPERATE THE SEWING-MACHINE.

and the pupils become very expert in this line. Having learned to read and spell, typewriting is an accomplishment easily picked up. The machines used in this school are fitted with a keyboard no different in construction from the ordinary machine. It is easy for the blind pupil to write on a type-writer, but quite another thing when he essays to read what he or another has written. The ordinary typewritten page conveys no more meaning to him than so much blank paper. Just here is where the inventive brain, and large-heartedness of Mr. William B. Wait, principal of the institution, has made itself felt in the invention of a novel type-writer, for the blind. This machine uses the "New York Point" alphabet for the blind, which consists of certain combinations of raised dots, standing for certain letters. Should the operator wish to copy something from a book, printed in either this or the Braille style of raised lettering, he can read with one

Christianity Gaining in Japan

BY REV. H. LOOMIS, A. B. S.

WHEN the agent of the American Bible Society went to Nagoya, during the war with China, to distribute Scriptures among the soldiers, he called upon Gen. Katsura, the Commander of the garrison, and received from him a cordial welcome, and full permission to prosecute his work. The troops were even assembled for the express purpose of giving to each a copy of some portion of the Scriptures. Since that time Gen. Katsura has become Prime Minister. A few weeks ago, the agent of the American Bible Society called at his official residence in Tokio, and met with a very kind reception. In the most positive manner he affirmed that, in the present war, the question of difference in religion had no place. The government would maintain an attitude of strict impartiality to all. Christianity had been gaining in numbers and influence, and it was his wish that it might continue to do so. The kindly feeling of Americans were greatly appreciated. He was grateful for the work done by the American Bible Society, which had his cordial approval, and he would send at once to both the Army and the Navy Departments information to that effect.

Such an expression of the will of the Government is important at this time, as Japan will hereafter have a controlling influence among the nations of the East.

During the war between Japan and China, Major-General Kodama was the Vice-Minister of War, and much of the success that attended the movements of the Japanese armies was due to his masterly ability and energy. In addition to his military skill, he possesses a broad and liberal spirit that has made him deservedly popular in Japan. By his permission, Christian work throughout the army was then permitted, and the circulation of the Scriptures made possible among the soldiers. After the war with China ended, he was appointed Governor of Formosa, and the duties of that office have been discharged with singular ability. By his wise and generous policy he has overcome much of the prejudice of the people, and thus prepared the way for the further development and welfare of the country. He has now a leading place on the army staff, and the present plans for the prosecution of the war are said to be largely of his originating. Should his life be spared, there is little doubt that he will become one of the leading statesmen of Japan. It is a gratification to know that the future of the country is likely to be largely moulded by men of such a noble type.

Among the young men who have come suddenly to the front in the struggle between Japan and Russia, is Rear-Admiral M. Saito, who for the last five years has been Vice-Minister of the navy. He was for five years attached to the Japanese Legation in Washington, during the days of Presidents Arthur and Cleveland. It is said of him: "Successful in every position, and winning the warmest confidence of his superiors, on his return he was rapidly promoted and honored with an appointment that placed him close to the person of the Emperor."

When called upon by the Agent of the American Bible Society, he kindly offered to send to all the vessels in the navy such Scriptures as should be supplied.

Some years ago, a young Japanese named Kimura, went to America and entered the Bible Training School and it is to be hoped that many of the pastors and preachers will catch the same spirit.

At a service held in Kyoto, in May last, there was present a young priest named Eko Kano, of the Nichiren Shu, which is the most bigoted and one of the largest of all the Buddhist sects in Japan. Mr. Kimura preached upon the subject of "The Prodigal Son." The Lord helped his message and eighteen persons accepted Christ. Among them was the priest.

The following night he appeared again, and gave his testimony as to the power and value of the new experience that had come to him. "Many years," he said, "I have longed for peace, but I could not find it in the teachings of Buddha. I do thank God for what I have found, since Christ has pardoned all my sins and accepted me as his child. What a blessed thing this is! I cannot describe it to you. It passes all comprehension by those who have it not. You can never know what it is until your sins have been washed away in the blood of Christ."

He has since come to Tokio and has entered the training school for evangelists. Already ten persons have given their hearts to God as the result of his earnest efforts. Among them is Mr. Kimura's brother, who had long listened unmoved to the Gospel message. Mr. Kano has been taken into the employ of the American Bible Society and is engaged in spreading the Word of God among his people.

of Mr. Moody. After completing the course he returned to Japan, and has been doing evangelistic work with much success. It is a new thing in this country,

A TOKYO PASTOR REV. K. KIMURA EKO KANO

At a Conference of missionaries, held at Yokohama in 1872, a committee was appointed to translate the Scriptures, and the work was begun the following year. The translation of the New Testament was completed in 1879, and the whole Bible in 1887. The American Bible Society sent the Rev. L. H. Gulick, D.D., as agent to Japan in 1876. He continued in that position until 1881, when he was relieved by Rev. H. Loomis, who remains as incumbent at the present time.

For a number of years there were three Bible Societies working in the field, with an agent representing each. In 1890, the work was consolidated under a joint committee, and this plan was continued until the beginning of the present year. Owing to the large increase in the work, and the difficulty of superintending the whole field from one agency, it was decided to make a division, and the American Bible Society now occupies the northern, and the two British societies the southern portion of the country. During the time the American Bible Society conducted its work separately (previous to July, 1890), the total circulation was upwards of 600,000 volumes (including portions). During the period of united circulation (from July 1, 1890 to January, 1904), the total circulation was upwards of 1,500,000 copies of the whole Bible or integral parts of the same. Since the beginning of the present year, 32,000 Testaments and portions have been donated to the Japanese soldiers, and largely to the sick and wounded. The opportunity and need are now very great, and already the fruit is being manifest.

A Question of Conscience

ONE of our correspondents asks a question, which, in various forms, has been asked by others. It is whether a man is sure to be right when he obeys his conscience. Our friend is being urged to refrain from taking a course which is painful to him, but which he believes to be his duty. He would gladly yield to the solicitation of his friends if he could be convinced that it was right to do so; but as he naturally says, he is bound to follow the only light he has.

There are many who have been placed in a similar difficulty. A father who has to punish the son whom he loves; an employer who is being urged not to prosecute a dishonest employee; a voter who feels it his duty to vote against his party; a jurymen who would willingly agree with the other men in the box to acquit a prisoner of whose guilt he is convinced. In these and many such difficulties, a man asks himself whether he is bound to regard the voice of his conscience as the voice of God.

That the conscience is not always an infallible guide is very evident. The Apostle Paul tells us that before his conversion he "verily thought with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus." Alva acted according to his conscience when he sent Egmont to the scaffold. Calvin was honest in advocating the burning of Servetus. The Puritans believed themselves to be doing the will of God when they put witches to death. The conscience needs to be educated. Before a man trusts his conscience, he must take care that it is in line with the spirit of Christ; otherwise it may develop into egotism, and the man may believe himself infallible. He must keep himself humble, must seek light by prayer, must make sure that there is no corrupt or vindictive motive influencing him. Above all, he should cultivate the spirit of love and mercy, lest he become harsh and censorious. If after he has examined himself and has sought all the light accessible, then he must obey his conscience humbly as in the sight of God.

Spiritual Riches

IT is related of one of the Popes that he was once showing a distinguished visitor the Vatican treasures. He took him into the palatial chambers adorned with priceless frescoes and filled with other valuable works of art. He showed him the great gardens that surround the vast buildings. At last he showed him the treasure-house, in which are kept the vessels of precious metal, the heaps of glittering jewels and precious stones, with gold and silver that might have purchased a kingdom. "The day has passed," said the pontiff, observing his visitor's eyes fixed upon this great display of wealth, "when the Church needs to say 'silver and gold have I none.'" "Yes," was the quiet reply, "and the day has also passed when it could say 'Arise! take up thy bed and walk.'"

In that reply there lies hidden a great truth, yet one which is widely disregarded. In proportion as the Church gains in worldly possessions and acquires power and distinction in material affairs, it inevitably loses in spiritual power. In lowering its standard to win the approbation of the rich and influential, it degrades its great Founder. He taught men that all are children of the Heavenly Father—should the Church teach them that only those within its pale are the elect? He warned men against the allurements of riches—should the Church be obsequious to wealth and contemptuous of poverty? He taught us to love one another—should the Church divide us into classes, and encourage by such division, hatred of each other? He refused wealth and worldly honors and power—should the Church amass riches and clothe itself in worldly distinction and vainglory? Were He to return to earth to-day, where He and his disciples once lived as wanderers, with no revenues save the dole of charity, how would He regard his Church, with its estates, its reversions, its titles and its emoluments reaching into the millions, while the poor in many of its parishes cannot even buy a loaf of bread?

We frequently hear from small and struggling churches that have a hard time, financially speaking. Let them take comfort in the thought that a very rich church may yet be a very poor one; while the struggling congregation and the pastor who shares their lot, and still keeps them steadily and faithfully on the heavenly highway, may be spiritually opulent.

Port Arthur

NOW that the climax of modern barbarism has been reached in the wholesale slaughter which has made Port Arthur a human shambles, the world stands dumb with horror at the result. Scientific murder has scored its greatest triumph. Each side has outstripped its rival in diabolic, man-killing devices. Terrible and revolting has been the struggle, as is attested by the blood-soaked hills around the fortress, strewn with unburied dead, and the ruined city, with its business buildings, hospitals, and dwellings all tumbled in a mass of inextricable confusion.

Glory, fame, heroism, patriotism—what now are all the fine, familiar phrases we are wont to apply to war, in view of those terrible scenes on the Port Arthur hillsides? They are meaningless, and worse than meaningless words. Where all is sacrificed to brutish ferocity; where no quarter is given or asked; where truce flags are disregarded; where all humane feelings are forgotten in the mad haste to destroy life by cannon, bomb, steel, bullet, or mine; where men are mowed down like ripe grain and trampled out of recognition—how can there be either true glory or heroism? It is the brutal lust of battle, run to madness.

Though the end of this merciless and needless war is not yet in sight, a stage has apparently been reached where the civilized world need no longer keep silence. A month ago, even the suggestion of mediation would have been resented as inopportune. It is not so now. The Mikado has publicly expressed his desire for peace, although he cannot take the initiative, and Russia is rapidly undergoing a change of feeling. We believe that if there should ring out from every pulpit in America, a summons to Christians throughout the land to unite in an appeal to our government to take all necessary measures to hasten mediation, such a movement would be productive of the best results. It would stimulate the Christian churches of Europe, and through these, the statesmen and cabinets.

If the Christian Church really has peace at heart and is willing to make sacrifice for it, it might do more toward the preservation of world peace than all other human agencies combined.
